I want to say that I think it would be a great mistake for us not to pass this amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER]. Recently, when home during the intermission, I met scores and scores of workingmen in my district, mill men, glass-house men, and miners, and they look upon this act down here taking away 2¾ per cent beer as being an infringement of their rights and privileges, and they say so positively. Good men, some of the best men we have, honest men, men who had boys in the war, said, "What do they mean down there?" I said, "Who mean?" "Why, all of them down there in Washington, to take away our last vestige of privilege that we have in 2¾ per cent beer, something that we are accustomed to, something that does not do us any injury and certainly does not do them any injury. We want them to let us keep it if possible." They do not say very complimentary things as to what they might do if it is taken away from them.

Gentlemen, I believe you are making a mistake. I believe that the passage of this bill without allowing 2¾ per cent beer will not alone be detrimental, as far as we are concerned generally, but I want to say to the Republicans of this House that the President of the United States had to come to the rescue of the daylight saving for the people, and other legislation, and he may do so in this case. So I think the wiser plan is to put this provision in here. It harms no one, and I am for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri. [Applause.] I yield back the rest of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LONGWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 120. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive, for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, Tao Hung Chang and Zeng Tze Wong, citizens of China; and

H. J. Res. 65. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan tents for use at encampments held by veterans of the World War.

PROHIBITING INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE].

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] clearly presents the question whether or not this House stands for the enforcement of war-time prohibition. The gentleman says that the miners and laborers require intoxicating liquor at the end of their day's work. His very argument admits that 2¾ per cent beer is intoxicating. Is this House going to accept the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Missouri? If it does, it will make war-time prohibition a national farce. [Applause.] My distinguished colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. DYER] a few days ago contended before the House that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue had never officially recognized the fact that beverages containing alcohol in excess of one-half of 1 per cent was intoxicating. He read into the RECORD various Treasury decisions and other data to sustain this contention. I now call the gentleman's attention to the last Treasury decision upon this subject. It is No. 2788, and under the heading of "Malt liquors" this Treasury decision at paragraph b, section 14, provides:

Within the intent of the act of November 21, 1918, a beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume will be regarded as intoxicating.

[Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague, Mr. IGOE.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I would like to have pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 1, after the word "States," strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, and I would like to have the point of order settled now.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not before the House now—only for information.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to a point of order; I thought somebody would make it. This is the most unusual situation ever presented to the House. In the first place, the war prohibition act is a rider on an Agricultural bill. Riders seem to be abhorred by some Members of the House, but this one seems to meet with the approval of those who always object to them.

This morning we tried to give this House a chance to vote on the repeal of war-time prohibition, and upon a proposition to give the President the right to suspend it whenever, in his opinion, he thought the time had come when it was no longer necessary to keep it in force. We are met with points of order and objections, but they are absolutely in accord with the position always taken by the prohibitionists since this question came into Congress. When it was sought to give the people of the country a chance to vote upon the eighteenth amendment by providing that it should be submitted for ratification to conventions in the States, objection was made because it would give the people a chance to vote upon it and not the legislatures. Now, throughout the country in those States where an effort has been made to submit the ratification by the legislatures to the people of the States, so that they might have a chance to pass upon the action of their legislatures, we find the prohibitionists appealing of the Constitution. Yet when we appealed a few days ago to the Constitution, we were denounced. They want to prevent a vote by the people throughout the country upon that question. To-day they will not give this House of 435 men an opportunity to vote upon the question of whether you will continue this war prohibition act or whether it shall be repealed or modified whenever the President deems modification might be proper.

I am for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], but I am hopeful that this amendment which I have offered will be adopted, because this Congress has not the right at this time to extend the war prohibition act as they are attempting to do in this definition. The war is over, and yet to-day, in the only instance, I believe, which we have in the Congress, an attempt is being made on this occasion to extend war-time legislation. All of the other war-time legislation has been repealed or will expire and no attempt is made to extend it.

Gentlemen say that the definition of intoxicating liquor as carried in this Title I is not an extension, but it is, for the reason that it includes things which are not intoxicating. I have no doubt but that Congress, under the war-time power, in originally passing this war prohibition act, if it might have passed it originally and constitutionally, could define intoxicating liquors. We could have prohibited the use of leather or anything else, but at this time, when the Army is about to be demobilized, when trade is being opened to all the world, when all the war activities of the Government have ceased, it is beyond the power of Congress to say that in the exercise of its war powers it might extend this act to include things which were not prohibited in the original act.

Under the law of Congress as it stands, if it is to stand, the courts may decide what is intoxicating, and if it is to stand, I hope it will be enforced. But this Congress can surely trust the courts. A few days ago gentlemen read reports here of how the law was being enforced, and yet to-day another gentleman on the committee and other Members of the House will dispute that, and say that it is a farce unless you pass this law. I believe that the law as it stands, if it is to continue, can be enforced, and will be enforced, and I say that you ought to leave it to the courts to determine under the law what are intoxicating liquors. It is beyond the power of Congress now, and it is unfair and unjust to extend the act at this time, and I hope that when this House comes to vote they will strike out the definition of intoxicating liquors, even if they are to allow the rest of the bill to stand.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, thus far in the consideration of this bill I have said nothing, and now I find myself embarrassed by the attitude of two of my colleagues for whom I entertain very high personal regard, one on the Republican side and one on the Democratic side, both men of stalwart ability and the highest personal character, and both as wrong as any men ever were in the world. I regret it. I am not one of those who quibble about the amount of alcohol in a beer glass. If a glass of beer as manufactured contains one-hundredth part of 1 per cent of alcohol and the committee would invite me to vote to prohibit its sale, I would vote that way. We are seeking to put an end forever to a traffic which, as far as it is possible to ruin, has ruined this Nation. The brewer has linked his fate with that of the distiller, and by the final and deliberate judgment of the country they have both been condemned, and it is our duty in response to the mandate of the good people of 45 States to banish them both from this fair land forever.

I hope that when this Congress has acted that the final chapter will have been written, the final act passed, and that never again will the open doors of the saloon blight the hopes or destroy the happiness of the people of this Nation.

Gentlemen plead for 2.75 per cent beer, as they call it. I do not know what it is. I am a Democrat, but, having some Republican proclivities, I have tasted beer, and the Lord only knows, I do not know, whether it contained 4 per cent or 2¼ per cent or one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. I am against the sale of it. I am for a law which will make it impossible for any man to sell it. Gentlemen say that this law is too drastic. I tell you, when you are dealing with a class of men who we know will never willingly submit to law, men who will only yield when they are compelled to yield, then of necessity we must deal drastically with them. [Applause.]

Gentlemen recently have produced the records of this city to show the increased crime since the advent of prohibition, but they forget to tell the House and the country that much of the record of crime in this city—possibly most of it—is the record of prosecutions of men who are violating the liquor laws in force in the District of Columbia. That is true everywhere. Adopt a local-option law, adopt a State prohibition law, make it bone dry in the District of Columbia, and immediately, aided and abetted and counseled by the brewery interests, with the sanction and approval of the brewers, men who have no regard for their manhood at once violate the law in order to bring it into disrepute, having assurance of the support of the brewers in their unworthy and criminal acts. Gentlemen know that throughout the country brewers have said to men, time and time again, "Violate this law, bring it into disrepute, give us a great list of crimes on the criminal dockets of the courts, in order to dissuade the people from the righteous course they are pursuing, and we will help you," and then they talk and harp about the increase of crime. I tell you that when you have driven out of this land every brewer and distiller, and thus closed the door of every saloon and driven out every bootlegger, then there will be ushered in a time when crime in the Nation will decrease and the happiness, righteousness, and real prosperity of the people increase. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON].

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Chairman, I propose to offer an amendment to section 2 to insert the word "hereafter" in line 4, page 2, after the word "shall," and then strike out the word "liquors" and insert the word "beverages." Mr. Chairman, the reason for asking for time on this amendment is this: That this first part of this act has no exception that allows for the sale of patent medicines, toilet waters, or flavoring extracts. Those exceptions apply to the second part of the bill and the war prohibition bill, and there is no exception at all. But we think by the change of the word "liquors" there to "beverages" that beverages having an accepted name, we will be protected by this provision. I understand that the chairman of the committee will accept that amendment. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SABATH. What is the amendment? Have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "shall," insert the word "hereafter," and in line 4, on page 2, strike out the word "liquors" and insert the word "beverages."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that my amendment be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "volume," insert "Provided such words or anything contained in title 1 hereof or in the war prohibition act shall not be construed to mean or include wines containing not more than 11 per cent of alcohol by weight."

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is to permit the use of this year's grape crop if the amendment is adopted. I take advantage of the short time given me to say if this House is going to adopt legislation as oppressive as section 1 of this act is, it should be informed what it is doing.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not before the House for action.

Mr. DYER. I make the point of order against the gentleman's point of order that the matter is not before the committee.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the sense of fairness of the prohibitionists in the House. The grape industry of this country exists in a great many States, but practically the great bulk of the industry is in the State of California. You people of the Eastern States are not familiar with that industry as we know it in the State of California. To-day there is a grape crop on the vines in California the value of which is estimated by the viticultural commission at $12,000,000. If this Congress should adopt section 1 of this act, it will prevent the farmers of California from using these $12,000,000 of grapes that now hang upon the vines. And in connection with that I want to call attention to this: The grape industry is one of its own peculiar kind for this reason: It takes four years to raise a grapevine to the productive age. The cost of raising resistant stock from which our dry wines are largely produced is from $250 to $300 an acre. It would cost the farmers of California over $2,000,000 to dig up the vines devoted to the dry-wine industry when prohibition goes into effect. Next winter when the Federal prohibition amendment goes into effect the farmers of California expect to begin digging up their vines. Do you want to adopt this sort of a precedent in the United States of America with reference to farmers who have given so many years of their lives to the development of the vineyards at great expense, while the crop is about ready to be gathered, to the value of $12,000,000, eight months after the war is over, under the pretense of war necessity? Are you going to deprive them of their hard earnings? It is all right to enforce the Federal prohibition amendment when it goes into effect. It is the duty of this Congress to do that. But I appeal to every sense of the fairness that has been the highest quality of the citizens of America; do not deny these farmers the use of the grapes now on their vines. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my State we have heard practically the same arguments urged against prohibition that have been urged by those who are now endeavoring to emasculate this law. We went through the same process which the Nation as a whole is now passing through. At first, in Tennessee, we had no statutory provision defining what constituted intoxicating liquors. The result was that beverages were sold in various different forms and under various names and with various percentages of alcoholic content, and there was no uniformity of holding, there was no uniformity of enforcement, and, in fact, we had no effective enforcement at all until our State enacted a statute defining intoxicating liquors as defined in this law—that is, one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. [Applause.]

After that was done the laws were enforced. We got results. Having had eight years' experience as circuit judge in the enforcement of those laws, I have repeatedly seen men who had imbibed so long and so liberally that they were almost pickled in alcohol come into court and swear that they had drunk so many bottles of the beverage under consideration and it had not intoxicated them, with the result that frequently the preponderance of the evidence was that it was not intoxicating, when, in fact, the beverage was intoxicating. The criterion should not be what will intoxicate a man who can stand a great deal of intoxicants, but what will intoxicate an ordinary man, one who is not an habitual drinker of alcoholic liquor. If you permit 2¾ per cent, it simply means that those who desire to become intoxicated will drink that much more in volume in order to get the alcohol. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. GARD. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman had made in his official capacity, while he was on the bench, any judicial interpretation of the language which he now refers to?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I gave a legal definition, yes; but the evidence to which I referred, which was continuously piled into court, would frequently overturn that definition and confuse the minds of the jury to such an extent that justice was undoubtedly very frequently thwarted.

Now, we have the prohibitory law. The question is whether or not we will provide the instrument for its proper enforcement. Those opposing this legislation say that they are in favor of a reasonable enforcement. They simply want an enforcement; or, rather, a regulation, that will permit the sale and use of liquor. We know from experience, and that experience is what has caused the agitation which is now sweeping the country, that the liquor traffic has refused to be regulated. The only other recourse, as has been demonstrated in every State where it has been tested, is to absolutely and unequivocally abolish it. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. SABATH. When did you adopt your last prohibition law for the State of Tennessee?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It went out under what is known as the "four-mile law"; and it was finally legislated out, as you might say, of the larger cities several years ago.

Mr. SABATH. And how much time was then granted to give to the people opportunity to comply with the law, or when did the act go into force?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. In some instances no time was provided, and there was but little time provided in any instance, except when the law was passed prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. A few months was then allowed.

Mr. SABATH. How much time was given then?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PELL: Page 2, lines 4 and 5, after the word "liquors" strike out "which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume," and insert in lieu thereof "which are by a jury decided to be in fact intoxicating."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any reason why we should not be willing to trust to the opinion of a jury in a matter like this. The violation of a prohibition law, however offensive it may be, is not murder. We allow a murderer the protection of a jury. A man who burns a house down can be protected by a jury. His offense can be tried by 12 of his peers. But you are denying it to a man who sells a bottle of beer.

Now, there is not a man in this House who seriously believes that 1 per cent or 2 per cent or 2½ per cent could possibly get any grown man drunk. He could not hold enough. There is not a man that does not know perfectly well, and there is not a man from a prohibition State that does not realize perfectly well, that the vast majority of the people of this country know this to be a fact. That is the reason you are afraid of going to a jury, because you know you would not get conviction. And I ask that this question of fact shall be decided as questions of fact have been decided, according to our common law for 500 years, by a jury of 12 men gathered from the neighborhood.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL]. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman, I only asked for two minutes in order to make a statement in reference to the wine-grape industry of the State of California.

As I said here the other day, actual experiences are better than a week's argument. The two greatest grape-producing counties in the State of California—Fresno County and San Bernardino County—have not only voted themselves bone dry but they voted by large majorities for a bone-dry, State-wide prohibition amendment to our Constitution in 1918. [Applause.] And the State of California, including every county and every vine-growing section in the State, in 1918 voted by a majority of 17,000 for a bone-dry, State-wide amendment, excluding from these figures only the city of San Francisco, in which there is not a single wine grape.

The people of the East have an idea that the wine-grape industry of California is about the biggest thing we have in that State. We have in the State of California 160,000 acres devoted to the wine-grape industry. As compared with that we have 11,000,000 acres devoted to general farming in the State of California. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], and at his request, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, under the peculiar parliamentary situation that exists this is the last opportunity to offer an amendment to strike out Title I of this bill. Of course, I can not predict what disposition may be made of the amendment under consideration or of other amendments to this section, but should this section be entirely unamended, and should no gentleman who has a prior claim to recognition, a member of the Judiciary Committee, offer such an amendment, I shall move at the proper time to strike out Title I of this bill. I do this, gentlemen, because I do not believe that there is any legitimate connection between Title I and Title II of this bill. There is no legitimate connection between the enforcement of war prohibition and the enforcement of the eighteenth constitutional amendment.

In my judgment the Committee on the Judiciary should have given an opportunity to this House to decide both questions on their merits. They should have brought in two bills instead of one [applause], so that Members of this House might have had an opportunity to vote on each measure separately. I have not the least question that there are a number of gentlemen here who would be willing to vote for a strict enforcement of the national constitutional amendment.

But the situation with regard to this so-called war prohibition is entirely different. There are a number of gentlemen following the leadership of the President of the United States in this matter who believe that this measure should be stricken from the statute books. The necessity for that measure, according to the President, has entirely ceased. If he be right, and I believe he is, surely the necessity for the strict enforcement of this unnecessary law has also ceased. He said officially to this House, in his capacity as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, that "the demobilization of the military forces of the country has progressed to such an extent that it seems to me entirely safe now to remove the ban on the manufacture and sale of wine and beer."

Therefore we are advised by him who is the most competent judge of the necessity of this emergency legislation that the emergency has ceased to exist, and that the law ought to be repealed, and I for one think that this House ought to have an opportunity to vote on the question of the war-time prohibition as differentiated from the question of the enforcement of the national constitutional amendment.

I make this explanation now because under the rule lately adopted by the House it will be impossible to do so later. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, although I am a member of the committee which reported this bill, I did not participate in the general debate, and have kept silent so far. I hope this will not be construed, however, as a lack of interest on my part in this measure, because I am deeply interested in it.

Now, if I have any criticism of the measure, it is that it is not severe enough. [Applause.] I know that the word has gone out——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I have but five minutes.

Mr. DYER. I would like to know what the punishment would be.

Mr. MORGAN. Any punishment that it had should be heavier in Missouri than in Oklahoma. [Laughter.]

Congress has already spoken, and in the so-called war prohibition act this sentence occurred:

> After June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export.

This paragraph, to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] offers his amendment, defines those words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors." Of course, I am opposed to this amendment. If I were offering an amendment to this section, I would make it read this way: "Those words shall be construed to mean any liquor which contains any percentum of alcohol by volume."

I repeat, if I had my way and if I were amending this bill, I would make it read so that those words "beer and wine and intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" should be construed to mean liquors that contain any percentage of alcohol. I believe that is the right way. If we intend in good faith to enforce this law we should prohibit the sale for beverage purposes of intoxicating liquors that contain any percentage of alcohol. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, war-time prohibition should be repealed. It was brought about as a rider to the Agricultural appropriation bill. It was a war measure. It came into being on account of the war to conserve food and fuel. When the armistice was signed this economy became unnecessary. The purpose for which it was enacted being accomplished, the law should be repealed. [Applause.] The President on May 20, 1919, in his message to Congress, said:

> The demobilization of the military forces has progressed to such a point that it seems to me entirely safe now to remove the ban upon the manufacture and sale of wines and beers.

Why do not you Prohibitionists heed his advice? A great majority of you were lying awake nights for an opportunity to repeal the daylight-saving law because of its inconvenience to the farmer, and you overlooked its hardships on the millions of unfortunates to whom this extra hour of sunshine was a godsend. You succeeded in repealing this law, but the great humanitarian in the White House vetoed the bill, and we sustained his veto.

You are jubilant now in the knowledge that you have more than enough votes to pass this vicious bill, but do not be overconfident—the President may use his veto power on this measure. I sincerely hope he does. [Applause.]

The eighteenth amendment provides, "The manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited." The big question is to define what is an intoxicating beverage. This bill would construe it to mean any liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, and the prohibitionists are arguing that this definition was intended by the eighteenth amendment. The amendment forbids intoxicating liquors. Chemists, scientists, and experts maintain 2¾ per cent beer is not an intoxicant. The American Medical Association in convention at Atlantic City unanimously declared that 2¾ per cent beer is nonintoxicating, but that its use is beneficial to humanity at large, and that pure light wines will help prevent the use of narcotics, meaning opium and the like, and men in authority inform us where prohibition has been in effect that addicts to the use of these narcotics have largely increased in numbers, and they anticipate a greater increase when national prohibition comes into being; therefore what is intoxicating liquors becomes a judicial question, one for the courts to decide.

I am informed—and the charge was made on the floor of this House and not denied—that this bill was prepared by representatives of the Anti-Saloon League, assisted by counsel for the patent-medicine associations on matters in which they were interested, hence I am not surprised at the drastic legislation that they are attempting to enact into law.

It is a question open to argument whether the legislatures represented the views and sentiments of the majority of their people when they passed this amendment. We had a direct vote in Chicago in April, 1919, men and women voting. The men's wet vote was 276,817. The men's dry vote was 76,165. The women's wet vote was 129,373. The women's dry vote was 77,014. The men's wet majority was 200,652. The women's wet majority was 52,359. The wet majority in its entirety was 259,011. [Applause.]

There is no doubt but that this bill in its application is un-American; is contrary to the ideals entertained by this country's founders; is opposed to that freedom of action, that liberty of operation which should be expected in this country; is directly opposed to that unrestraint which our forefathers expected when they landed on these Columbian shores; is not altogether different from that spirit which they tried to avoid and escape when they came here in the Mayflower. This bill, as has already been expressed, even by certain upholders of the dry issue, is so drastic, so unlawfully restraining of the rights and personal liberty of Americanhood, that it would be a shame and an outrage to the American mind were it to be passed. There is no use repeating or reviewing the prohibition arguments pro or con, for that issue is not in question and such remarks would be useless and a waste of time, but the bill under consideration, by its impracticability, senseless deprivation of our rights and personal privileges assails the principle of prohibition with such force and further brings before our mind's eye its illogical aspect so forcibly that it is good to stop and consider whether we have not gone too far, when we as the National Government attached to our Constitution such a prohibition, when we representing a Nation of freemen have started to impose restraints, I might say undue restraints, upon the freedom of our citizens. All previous amendments to our Constitution furthered the liberties and rights of our people; this is our first departure; here we are depriving them of their rights, and I am apprehensive of the outcome. I appreciate that our Constitution is not a blanket license; that is, an absence of all restraints; but remember that liberty at its source and foundation consists of the absence of all undue restraints. And I say that prohibition is without question such restraint. The proof of it is that if our Constitution warrants the passage of such legislation why may it not enforce antismoking or antienjoyment of any of our personal rights? It goes too far; what we desire our citizens to practice, the laws that we must pass to eradicate the evils of alcoholism, the prohibition that we must enact to safeguard coming generations, the relief we must give to many wives and children of drunkards must be such as conduce to temperance. Temperance, that is the thing. Temperance, that is the virtue, the qualification of a man. You deprive an animal of his cravings completely, because it is not a man, it has no will power, no mind, no sense of morality; but a man, he is above animal life, he has natural attributes which he must learn to use and cultivate, and among these the sublimest, the one by which he is supreme to nature and animal life, the one which makes him almost angelic, is his free will, his capability to do or not to do. It takes a man to be temperate, but prohibition is for the animal.

The charge made here that most of the poverty and misery are the result of drink is wrong. I maintain that poverty and misery drive men to drink [applause], and if some of you prohibitionists who wax eloquent on the dry situation will use some of your oratorical ability when the minimum-wage bill comes up to give the poor unfortunate scrub women, elevator men, and others who have been working for the Government for years at the paltry salary of $2 per day an opportunity to receive an increase of $1 per day you will be doing your duty for deserving people, and if you are anxious to destroy poverty and misery you can accomplish it more readily by paying a living wage than you can by prohibition, and when this wage bill is called up for final passage I want a record vote. I am anxious to find out how these great prohibition benefactors of humanity will be recorded. [Loud applause.]

What is the conclusion? Control and regulation, limitation and guidance. They have a system of laws in Switzerland by which every man or head of a family is allowed a certain quantity of liquor each week or month, and I am informed it is working admirably and the people are contented, happy, and well satisfied. Some may say that this is mostly theoretical and smacks too much of the sphere of abstraction, of principles, that the prohibition amendment looks to practical results, to the sunshine it is going to bring to the home, to the family, to the health of the individual now, and to the generations to come. I say that I am not opposed to temperance, which would bring forth the results above described, but I am opposed to the principle of a general and unqualified prohibition, curtailing the freedom of action and the liberty of conscience. If we approve such a principle now, who knows how far we will go in time to come?

Further, I might dwell on the economic phase of the question, which is not to be disregarded, though to my mind less forcible. The men who will be thrown out of employment and to my farmer friends I will suggest that one of the principal staples of the Middle West will fall down in price and bulk in production. That will have a material effect upon our economic life. Corn will drop so far down in price in years to come that it will hardly pay the costs of raising it. I at one time had the figures of the amount of corn consumed in Illinois only in the manufacture of liquor, an amount staggering in its quantity, and bear in mind the loss in revenue will be from $600,000,000 to $1,000,000,000.

Henry Ward Beecher once said:

If you say to me that I ought not to drink, perhaps I would agree with you; but if you tell me that I must not drink, I will drink, because I have a natural right to do so, to drink what I please.

This, to my mind, represents the attitude of Samuel Gompers and the representatives of 2,640,000 laboring men when at convention in Atlantic City they voted in favor of light wines and beer.

This bill gives the commissioner almost plenary power in its enforcement, and if he is so inclined he could exercise this authority arbitrarily. Doctors and druggists are required to make so many reports, if they desire to carry on their professions or business, it will be necessary to employ a clerical force to assist them. The housewife is denied the privilege of making cider if it contains one-half of 1 per cent alcohol. I am astounded to discover that the hospitality of one's home is invaded and denied him; you are forbidden giving away or treating to a glass of liquor a caller or visitor.

If one traveling should become suddenly ill on a train and take a drink, he would be amenable to arrest. Another provision, no search warrant shall issue to search any private dwelling occupied as such, unless it is in part used for some business purpose, such as a store, shop, restaurant, hotel, or boarding house. This means that if a man has money enough to live in a private dwelling it can not be searched, but the poor man, who may be forced to occupy a flat over some store, is amenable to the provision and his home may be searched. A man with money can lay in a supply for himself and grandchildren, but the millions of toilers who have not the means to take time by the forelock and lay in a stock are deprived of their wine and beer; you are going to create considerable dissatisfaction, and God knows this is an inopportune time to stir up trouble. [Applause.]

Under the provisions of this bill when a man is accused under certain conditions the burden of proof is shifted to the defendant, and he must prove and establish his innocence. Violative of the established law that a man is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, and the burden of proof is on the State or the United States. If one owns a house and a tenant, without the knowledge of the owner, violated the provisions of this act and the tenant should be tried and fined and he failed to pay the fine, the premises would be subject to a lien to the amount of the fine, and the property could be sold to satisfy the lien.

Finally, let me conclude by saying that I am opposed to the present measure, first, because of my belief in American freedom, whose spirit is here assailed and minimized; second, because of its impracticability and unreasonableness; third, because of the principle of prohibition which it tends to enforce; fourth, because I have always believed and considered that prohibition is the evolution of a puerile mind; fifth, because I believe that a man is not hopeless as a species of the human race—that a man should and can live as a man; sixth, because morality should spring from our educational system and be taught where the child's mind and heart are being developed and not from the top by constitutional enactment; seventh, because a government which forces its citizenship to practice morality and virtues by statutory enactment is dealing in the sphere of the conscience, is admitting before the world the moral inferiority of the nation; eighth, because religious freedom is guaranteed us by the Constitution, and this sort of legislation, as prohibition, has a tendency to curtail that freedom, is a reaching out in the realm of freedom of conscience. Is not freedom of conscience as precious as freedom of thought and speech? I am as amenable to the wishes of the voters of my district as any man here, but if I believe a thing to be wrong, all the constituencies and offices within the gift of the voters would not make me break faith with myself. I have always tried to vote according to the dictates of my conscience. I have to live with my conscience, and with the help of God I will be on the square with myself. I do not believe in prohibition, and I will vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is the keystone to the arch of the liquor traffic. Samuel Untermeyer, the great criminal lawyer of the city of New York, was in Washington last week to appear before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate for 2.75 beer. Two and three-quarters per cent beer pleases the brewers of this Nation and pleases the liquor traffic of this Nation. It is all they want. That is what they are after, and if they get that by this amendment you might stop right here. You are not going to enforce war-time prohibition; you are not going to enforce the constitutional amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW. That is the truth.

Mr. HERSEY. Now, whatever satisfies the brewers of this Nation does not satisfy me. [Applause.] For the life of me I can not understand how certain of my fellow Members sitting here in this Congress with the oath upon them to support the Constitution of the United States, which Constitution has been duly amended by the people to prohibit all intoxicating liquors, can come in here under that oath to support that Constitution and plead for 2.75 per cent beer, which the brewers want. If they get it, every brewery will run day and night between now and the time when they are stopped. [Applause.] Every saloon will open, every German brewer and liquor seller in this Nation will be back at his old job, and we will be wet. I think we ought to understand the object and purpose of this 2.75 amendment and vote it down. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REBER] three minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. REBER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I should like to read a little piece of news that appeared in the Herald of this city this morning:

BUTTERMILK MAY COME UNDER NEW DRY BAN.

WESTFIELD, N. J., July 13.

Buttermilk is to be put on the skids if a strict enforcement of the prohibition law is carried out, according to Prof. L. B. Allyn, of the State Normal School, for it seldom shows less than 1 per cent of alcohol content and rapidly gains more through fermentation. Probably John D. Rockefeller and other abstemious persons who have used buttermilk freely as a beverage did not know with what a terrible menace they were dealing when they toyed with the by-product of the cow.

The main objection I have to this bill is that it is entirely too drastic. A bill that puts buttermilk in the list of outlawed beverages is, in my opinion, an injury to the prohibition cause and makes the law so ridiculous that public opinion will never sustain it. It is well known that a law to become effective must have public sentiment back of it.

A law that outlaws buttermilk and sweet cider and makes it a crime to manufacture and dispose of the same, or to have the same in your possession or on your premises, as this law does, is so extreme, so radical, and so fanatical that it does not deserve the support of the true friends of prohibition. A law that makes itself ridiculous can not be enforced and hurts the cause it is intended to benefit.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, for by the ratification of the 18th amendment it is the law of our Nation, but I am not in favor of putting Congress in the position of legislating that all beverages containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol are intoxicating when I know from actual test and experience that many beverages containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol are not intoxicating.

Federal courts have already decided that beer containing 2.75 per cent is not intoxicating. Their decisions were based upon tests that were fair and thorough and conclusive.

I had the pleasure of attending a picnic in my congressional district recently where every holder of a ticket had the privilege of drinking all the beer he desired, and many imbibed freely, and not a man was intoxicated. This picnic was held since July 1, and the beer that was given out there was of the 2.75 per cent quality and strength. I was at another festive gathering—a camp fire—in my district, held on July 5, where 2.75 per cent beer was openly sold. I drank two very fair-sized glasses of that beer, probably a pint and a quarter, inside of 10 minutes, and it had absolutely no intoxicating effect upon me whatever, and if it had had enough per cent of alcohol to be intoxicating it surely would have produced an effect upon me, because my system is not saturated with alcohol and is not immune to the effects of alcohol in beverages. I know that my system is free from alcohol because I have not drunk four quarts of beer in my entire life, nor two quarts of whisky or similar liquors, and my father did not drink double that quantity in his 87 years of existence, during 40 years of which he conducted a hotel.

The House will, I hope, pardon me for injecting these personalities in this speech, for I admit that I am proud of my father's temperate record and my own, but I want to emphasize as strongly as I can that 2.75 beer is, in my opinion and from my experience, not intoxicating. Now, if this 2.75 per cent beer is nonintoxicating, and several Federal courts have so held, what possible reason can there be for the suppression of its manufacture and sale, and especially as a war measure, when the war ended eight months ago.

One reason animating some of my colleagues is that some of the brewers were pro-German, and for that reason they should now be punished in this way; but they seem to lose sight of the fact that, by punishing these pro-German brewers, they also punish all brewers, whether they were loyal Americans or pro-German, a step in legislation that can not be sustained by good reason or fair practice. To punish all because some offended is rank injustice. If certain brewers were disloyal, they should be singled out and punished; but it is notoriously wrong to punish an entire class to reach a small number of that class. Some Members have said that it is their purpose to put the brewers and the saloon keepers out of business because these men had opposed their election to Congress. If this were a good reason, I, too, would be justified in voting for this bill, for I had this class of men opposed to me, because they knew that I was very temperate in the use of intoxicating liquors; but these gentlemen lose sight of the fact that, while there is a large number of brewers and saloon keepers, the number of people who are neither brewers nor saloon keepers is vastly greater, and it is this vast multitude that we, as legislators, must also consider, and we must protect their rights and privileges. Many Members have attacked the character of the saloons, and I do not wish to take up the time of this House to defend them as they have heretofore been conducted; but it seems to me that if the intoxicating liquors were eliminated and the saloons were confined to the sale of light wines and beer of nonintoxicating strength the saloons would become as decent and orderly as ice-cream parlors or any other places where the general public assembles.

In some cities temperance societies are trying to establish saloons where all nonintoxicating beverages can be bought and consumed. I am heartily in favor of this movement, because the poor man has claimed that the saloon is his club, and that he has as much right to have his club as the rich man has to have his, and in this I agree with him.

The argument has been advanced by many supporters of this bill that if the saloons are permitted to sell beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol they will soon thereafter sell beer containing a much higher percentage of alcohol. This proposition has some merit, for I fear many of the saloon men would yield to the pleadings of their customers for a drink containing a higher percentage of alcohol than the 2.75 per cent variety; but I think this could be prevented by making it impossible for the venders to secure beer containing more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol. This can be accomplished by prohibiting brewers from making and selling beer containing more than 2.75 per cent alcohol. A law could be made to this effect and enforced with less expense than will be entailed to enforce the law under consideration. Congress passed a law for the inspection and certification of meats and is enforcing it, and Congress has the power, I think, to compel the inspection and certification of beer before it leaves the brewery. If the Congress can devise no legal way of compelling brewers to submit to the inspection and certification of their product, then the States surely have the power; and as 45 of the States have already ratified the eighteenth amendment, there can be no reasonable doubt that they would not hesitate to adopt such a measure.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of the new Members of this House, and it may ill become me to criticize the other Members, but I have noticed that when many Members speak for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD they try to make it appear that they do not know anything about intoxicating drinks, and leave the public to infer that they never tasted liquors. I think it is silly to assume such an attitude and makes us ridiculous before our Nation. The public knows that we are just men and possess the virtues and frailties of men, and when we pretend to be what we are not, or allow ourselves to be placed in such a light, we lay ourselves open to just criticism.

Our constituents know who and what we are and what we were before they sent us here. They know that very few of us, if any, can truthfully say that we have never drunk intoxicating liquors as a beverage. However, it does not follow because we have not been bone dry that we are heavy drinkers or inebriates. In the time that I have been a Member I have not seen a Member under the influence of liquor or deport himself in a way unbecoming the dignity and sobriety of a legislator. There probably never was a legislative body more free from intemperance than I know this Congress to be, and it is just as far from the truth to charge this Congress with being a body of inebriates as it is to say that its Members do not know what intoxicating liquor tastes like. The truth lies between these extremes. Others who have spoken on this bill have stated clearly that Congress has no power to designate the per cent of alcohol that a beverage should contain to make it intoxicating, because if this Congress has the right and power to designate one-half of 1 per cent as the highest per cent permissible, then succeeding Congresses, having equal powers, can designate a higher or lower per cent, thus retaining the liquor question as a football of politics. What per cent of alcohol makes a beverage intoxicating and subject to prohibition should be left to the decision of the United States Supreme Court, and that decision should be strictly enforced.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to read an article published in the Sunday New York Times of July 13, 1919:

NOT ALL PROHIBITIONISTS—CHURCHMEN QUOTED AGAINST NATIONAL DRY LAWS.

The Association Opposed to National Prohibition issued a statement yesterday declaring that "professional prohibitionists and their lobbyists at Washington, who fancy that they are supported by all the churches except the Roman Catholic, will find sooner or later that they are deceived." It was announced by the association that opinions of churchmen reported to the headquarters at 19 West Forty-fourth Street were opposed to the enforcement of the prohibition laws.

"The religious support of the Anti-Saloon League is largely overestimated," said the statement. "Particularly is this true now that the so-called war-time prohibition has been tried out for something like a fortnight, and while the Anti-Saloon League lobbyists are seeking to pass the drastic Volstead bill for its enforcement. Men and women of the churches are not confusing in their minds the two questions of temperance and prohibition. Many of them draw the line very sharply between the two, and they fail to see that prohibition by sumptuary and drastic laws is the proper or effective way to promote temperance.

"'It is a shortsighted contribution to the cause of temperance,' writes the Rev. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst. 'I said so when national prohibition was first brought up in Congress, and I have seen no reason since then to change my mind.'"

Others whose opinions are quoted are the Rev. Dr. Robert W. Patton, national director of the Federal boards of the Episcopal Church; the late Bishop Potter; the Rev. Dr. J. H. Woodstock, archdeacon of Worcester, England; the Rev. Charles Stelzle; and the Rev. John Mockridge, of Philadelphia.

It is unnecessary for me to comment on this article. It speaks for itself. I wish to read also an item of news published in the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, Pa., of July 15, 1919, wherein George W. Anderson, Federal judge, decided that beer containing at least one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol was not intoxicating.

Also, decision of Federal Judge Foster.

NONINTOXICATING BEER HELD LEGAL.

BOSTON, July 15.

A ruling given to-day by George W. Anderson, Federal judge, that the sale of beer which is not intoxicating is not illegal under the present war prohibition act led to the quashing of the Government's test case against Sanford F. Petts and Leopold H. Vogel, liquor dealers, of this city.

Petts and Vogel were arrested last week charged with selling beer containing at least one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. It was the contention of the Government that the sale of any beer was against the law. The defendants demurred, arguing that beer must contain a sufficient amount of alcohol to be intoxicating to be illegal.

Judge Anderson sustained the demurrer and declared that he had not the slightest doubt that Congress intended to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors and did not intend to stop the sale of nonintoxicating beverages.

"We appear ridiculous," he said, "by giving a misinterpretation to an act of Congres. I won't be a party to it."

BREWERS' DEMURRER IS SUSTAINED AT NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, July 15.

Federal Judge Foster to-day sustained a demurrer filed by officials of the American Brewing Co. to an indictment charging that the manufacture of beer of more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcoholic content was in violation of the war-time prohibition act.

On July 15 Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel for the Anti-Saloon League, appeared before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee and asked for sweeping search-warrant powers, suggesting that seizures be authorized without a warrant, or at least that warrants be issued without requiring testimony in support of requests. It seems to me that the advocates of this drastic enforcing act, in their zeal to put teeth into it, are going far to prevent the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution declares that "after one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited."

This amendment has been ratified by 45 of the 48 States in the Union and is the law of our Nation and must be enforced, and it is my purpose to support and defend the Constitution, as I am in duty bound as a law-abiding citizen and as my oath as a Congressman requires.

The Nation has adopted this law and it is not my purpose in any way to evade it or to persuade others to evade it, but I do not want to assist in passing an enforcing act that will defeat the very purpose of this law.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up any more time of this House, but wish to close by inserting an article which was published in the Public Ledger of July 13:

2.75 BEER CALLED SAME AS COFFEE—BREWERS' LAWYER SUBMITS RESULT OF ANALYSIS TO SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE—CIDER WORSE, TESTS SHOW—QUESTION OF INTOXICATING CONTENT FOR JURY TO DECIDE, UNTERMYER CONTENDS.

WASHINGTON, July 12.

Samuel Untermyer, of New York, appearing to-day before the Senate Judiciary Committee to protest on behalf of brewers against the continued enforcement of "war-time" prohibition and elimination of 2.75 per cent beer, gave the results of tests conducted by Prof. Harry Hollingsworth, professor of psychology at Columbia University, with beer embracing that percentage of alcoholic content.

An affidavit by Prof. Hollingsworth dealt with tests made with 2.75 per cent beer upon subjects ranging from the total abstainer to the occasional moderate drinker to a case of fairly regular but not excessive user of alcohol. The subjects ranged in age from 21 to 30 years, their health from a very poorly nourished man to a college athlete. His conclusion was that if intoxicating liquor is to be considered as any beverage which would have the same stimulating effect as coffee then the 2.75 beer is to be considered intoxicating, otherwise not.

George Whitehead, of New York, who is associated with Mr. Untermyer, pointed out that the affidavits filed with the committee upon behalf of the Anti-Saloon League were based "entirely upon the opinion of the men who made the demand, not upon any test," and that, therefore, "if any test had been made they must have agreed with those of the experts of the brewers."

SEEKING TO PROHIBIT NEAR BEER.

Mr. Untermyer and Senator WALSH of Montana engaged in a spirited argument upon the question whether Congress had the power to prohibit beer which contains no alcohol at all in order to make effective the war-time prohibition. Other members of the committee joined in the argument, and it became evident that this is one of the provisions now under consideration by the Senate committee, and that it should bar entirely all of the so-called near beers that are now being brewed.

Senator WALSH voiced the sentiment of the "drys" on this question when he pointed out that a beverage which tastes like beer and smells like beer might be used to cover a "blind pig" which actualy sold real beer to customers whom they knew.

"Why not prohibit water that is colored like beer?" asked the witness.

Mr. Untermyer submitted to the committee an affidavit of Lewis B. Allyn, of the Westfield Laboratory, Westfield, Mass., covering the results of an analysis made by him of more than 300 samples of soft drinks and patent medicines to determine their alcoholic content. Dr. Allyn held that ordinary home-made root beer contains as much as 2.75 per cent of alcohol, while another soft drink contained 1.27 per cent. Fifteen samples of ciders obtained from farmers ran from 4.51 per cent to 6.83 per cent by weight and from 5.72 per cent to 7.53 per cent of alcohol by volume.

Mr. Untermyer also presented a list of bitters and tonics which the said analysis showed contained from 16.10 to 41.50 per cent of alcohol by volume.

SAYS CONGRESS LACKS POWER.

Mr. Untermyer insisted that Congress is without power to pass a prohibition enforcement law which will be in fact an extension of the war-time prohibition bill.

He stated that if he were called upon to file a bill of complaint against the enforcement of this proposed law, he would allege that peace has been signed, the Army was being demobilized, that peace had been ratified by the enemy, that trade relations had been reopened with Germany, and that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, had declared that the necessity under which war-time prohibition had been enacted had disappeared. He added he did not believe that any court in the land would permit the farce of calling this legislation "war-time" prohibition.

CALLS LAW INSINCERE.

Mr. Untermyer took the committee to task for what he said was the insincerity of the enforcement legislation now proposed. He also said that it was vicious in that it was class legislation, so far as the war-time bill is concerned. It does not prohibit the man with plenty of money from stocking up his cellars with strong, spirituous drink for years to come, but it does prohibit the poor man from getting a drink that is regarded more as a food than as a beverage.

"My quarrel," Mr. Untermyer said, "is with your attempt to convert anything you please into intoxicating liquor. The war-time prohibition act applies only to intoxicating beer, and 2.75 per cent beer can be shown clearly not to be intoxicating. An extension of that act under the guise of an enforcement measure is not within the power of Congress."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Just for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. I have heard it said very often that if this legislation goes into effect in connection with the amendment to the Constitution the folks at home will not be allowed to make wine any more.

Mr. FOCHT. Or cider.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Is that true?

Mr. BARKLEY. If this bill is passed it will be unlawful for any person in the United States to manufacture any intoxicating liquor as defined in the law except as permitted in the act itself, and in the regulations to be made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the act, and if that wine is intoxicating, within the definition of this act, and manufactured for beverage purposes it will be against the law to manufacture it. [Applause.]

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. In other words, wine made at home—which, of course, is intoxicating, whether made from grapes, blackberries, or other berries—will be illegal.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is capable of interpreting the language of the act as well as I am. I do not desire to discuss that feature of it, and I do not want to take up my five minutes in doing so. But it will be unlawful to manufacture anywhere in the United States any intoxicating liquor as defined in this act except as specifically permitted in the act.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not now; let me get started. Mr. Chairman, I hope that none of these amendments offered will be adopted. In the first place, if the amendment striking out the definition of intoxicating liquor should be adopted and Congress should fix no definition of the meaning of the words in the war-time prohibition act, then the courts in enforcing the law, under the practice of the Federal courts, will have to adopt the definition of intoxicating liquors as fixed in the statutes of the various States.

Because in the practice in Federal courts, where Congress makes no provision, the law of the particular State governs. That would mean that there would be utter confusion in the Federal courts of the United States in seeking to enforce war-time prohibition, because one State may have a definition fixing one-half of 1 per cent, and some other State may have a definition fixing 2 per cent, and some other States may have fixed none whatever. Therefore the Federal courts seeking to enforce war-time prohibition, having to rely on a definition fixed by the State legislature, would have to take the definition of one State and then that of another, and the Supreme Court might hold that each was absolutely legal as fixed in the various States. Therefore it would be very unwise for this amendment to be adopted striking out the definition. There might, in that event, be 48 different standards and definitions of intoxicating liquors, if each State should see fit to fix a different standard.

I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] permitting the manufacture and sale of beer containing 2¾ per cent alcohol will not be adopted, because, while I do not claim to be an expert on the intoxicating qualities of beverages of any sort, I think any man who has had experience in prosecuting criminals, as it was my fortune to have it for four years, or has had to deal with liquor indictments, will testify to the fact that it is always very difficult to enforce a prohibition law where 2¾ per cent beer is allowed.

The man who sold the liquor will come into court and swear that it contained less than 2¾ per cent of alcohol. Other men will come in and swear that they saw men get drunk on that particular beverage that was sold by the man who testified that it contained less than 2¾ per cent. Others will swear it is not intoxicating. Therefore if an amendment is adopted and 2¾ per cent alcohol in beer is allowed, for all practical purposes you might as well wipe out the war-time prohibition act.

Another serious objection is that if 2¾ per cent beer is retained, you will have the saloons again in full operation. That is one of the things that we are trying to get rid of. It is the saloons, it is the surroundings, it is the evil that attends them, that we want to get rid of. If we let 2¾ per cent beer be sold as a beverage, every saloon that went out of business on the 1st of July will open its doors for the sale of 2¾ per cent beer, and there are many of them that will take chances on selling beer and other beverages with even more alcoholic content than that, if they have the opportunity to do so. If the war prohibition act is to remain in force, as it will, it ought to be enforced, and it can not be enforced if 2¾ per cent of alcohol is allowed in beer or any other beverage. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one minute more in order to ask him a question. I want to ask the gentleman if he would be in favor of this amendment of 2¾ per cent beer provided it is not permitted to be drank on the premises where sold. So that would do away with the saloons.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would not be in favor of that amendment, no matter where it is to be drunk. I want to say that the gentleman's own State, Missouri, fixes one-half of 1 per cent as the amount of alcohol in a beverage that is intoxicating. In addition to Missouri, 14 other States have fixed that amount, and 13 States say that anything that contains any quantity of alcohol is intoxicating.

Mr. DYER. I wanted the statement of the gentleman to see whether he was opposed to drinking three-quarters per cent beer because it would continue the saloons or not.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am opposed to it wherever it is sold, but I offered the suggestion as to the continuance of the saloons as an additional reason why it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am interested in the discussion as it applies principally to two things—one the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON], and the other principally to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

It was stated by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON] that he had an amendmentt which he offered, with the consent and approval of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. On last Friday the chairman said that he had been having conferences with persons interested relative to certain amendments to the bill and he would call the committee together. The committee has never been called together, so far as I know, and I speak of this because of my interest in legitimate manufacturing enterprises. I have the same interest that the gentleman from Maryland has in seeking to protect legitimate manufacturing enterprises. I do not think anybody wants to go so far as prohibiting the use of this and making it illegal which is necessary in medicine, articles necessary for the toilet and in flavoring extracts, which are necessary in the daily household economy. I refer to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON], because he says that his amendment was to strike out the word "liquors" and insert the word "beverages." I do not know whether that has the approval of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee or not, and therefore I would ask the gentleman whether he has so stated.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I know that an amendment of that kind has been offered.

Mr. GARD. I want to say that if the gentleman has in mind the liberalization of this law so as to take off the ban against legitimate enterprises, I am with him and think it is a proper amendment, but I want to call his attention to the fact that the amendment is offered in relation to "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is not necessary to make any other amendment, for the reason that the original language uses the word "beverage." I am trying to harmonize that.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I think it ought to be extended beyond that. I call the attention of members of the committee to the fact that I do not think the present law of war-time prohibition as it is written here contemplates the suppression of flavoring extracts. In Title II, however, that which provides for the enforcement of constitutional prohibition, I think it does. I think it an erroneous procedure to attempt to qualify the words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" by the use of the word "beverages," so as to protect flavoring extracts, because flavoring extracts should not be construed in relation to "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous beverages," and that is all the gentleman would have.

I speak of this because I want to join the gentleman in what he wishes to do, since he said the other day that he realized that the bill was imperfect and should be amended. I think the bill should be amended to properly safeguard flavoring extracts, so that no barrier may be raised against legitimate enterprises. As I said in general debate, I think the language in Title II, section 3, absolutely prohibits the manufacture of flavoring extracts, and it ought to be modified so as to protect legitimate manufacturing enterprises that they may continue as they have in the past.

When the chairman of the committee advises the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee of the Whole what his idea is I shall be pleased to join with him on any amendment which will liberalize the war-time prohibition bill, and especially the constitutional prohibition bill, to permit these legitimate enterprises, not connected at all with the traffic in intoxicating liquors, to continue, so that the products of their manufacture, which may contain some trifling amount of alcohol, shall not be prohibited.

I shall address myself now in the few brief moments at my disposal to the legal question in respect to the language sought to be stricken out by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE], being the language from lines 1 to 5 on page 2. There is not a single law or measure affecting the War Trade Board, the War Industries Board, the food regulation, or other war-time measures which would for the slightest fraction of a moment be given any consideration in respect to its extension by any committee or any part of the Congress of the United States.

This morning we went to the extent that 247 Members in this House voted against the retention of the daylight-saving act. This was largely because it has been associated in the minds of Members as a war measure, and the people of the country realize that we are not at war, and that all these things called war measures are simply subterfuges and evidences of legislative hypocrisy, and the people of the United States now want no more of them and no extension of their kind. I do not believe the war-time prohibition act is capable of this extension legally, and I do not think it should be extended by hypocritical and hysterical action of the Members of this body.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Do I understand that the motion to strike out, referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], is before the committee?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have not offered that motion yet. As I understood the ruling of the Chair, that motion would be in order after all perfecting amendments are voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct—after all perfecting amendments are voted on. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. DYER.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOLDFOGLE) there were—ayes 84, noes 128.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. VOLSTEAD and Mr. DYER to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 151.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Several amendments were sent to the Clerk's desk to be read for information during the one hour allotted for debate on this section. Those amendments will now be reported by the Clerk and acted upon without debate. They will be reported in the order in which they were offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VENABLE: Page 2, line 3, after the words "shall be," insert the word "hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment, because it is not germane in that it changes the former war-time prohibition act. It is an attempt to amend the war-time prohibition act in a way in which this bill does not amend it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The amendment ought to go in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. It changes the terms of the war-time prohibition act.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. VOLSTEAD) there were—ayes 114, noes 14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEA of California: Page 2, line 5, after the word "volume," insert: "Provided, That such words or anything contained in Title I hereof or in the war-time prohibition act shall not be construed to mean or include wines containing not more than 11 per cent of alcohol by weight."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment, because it is not germane and it seeks to change the terms of the war-time prohibition act in a way that is not authorized by the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. In conformity with the decisions of the Chair, this is not germane, and the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. IGOE: On page 2, line 1, after the word "States," strike out the remainder of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. IGOE) there were—ayes 83, noes 128.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. IGOE and Mr. VOLSTEAD] reported that there were—ayes 94; noes 141.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON]: Page 2, line 3, after the word "shall," insert "hereafter," and in line 4, page 2, strike out the word "liquors" and insert "beverages."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the word "hereafter" has already been adopted by the committee and is therefore superfluous. I make the further point of order that to strike out "liquors" and insert "beverages" would be an amendment to the war-time prohibition act such as is not authorized by this present legislation; that the war-time prohibition act uses the word "liquors," which would mean any kind of liquid containing sufficient alcohol to make it intoxicating. For instance, it might be called "Frosty" or be called "Bevo" or "Poinsetta," or called any other name, and which might be intoxicating, and yet it would not make it a penal offense to sell or use under this statute. It is not germane. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if we strike out the word "liquors" as contained in this recitation of what the war-time prohibition act contains and place instead thereof the word "beverages," then any kind of liquid not labeled beverage—a flavoring extract that might contain 90 per cent of alcohol, which would produce drunkenness, that could be drunk without fear of hurt to the human body, or that a hair tonic containing 90 per cent of alcohol, that might not be injurious to the human system yet be intoxicating—could be used in violation of this law, because it was not made as a beverage. It might be made, for instance, into a hair tonic; it might be made into a flavoring extract; it might be made into a purported medicine; and yet it would violate the purpose and the intent of the war-time prohibition act and not be in violation of this enforcement act. I submit it is not germane to the war prohibition act or to this proposed legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is germane to this bill, and inasmuch as this provision does amend to that extent the war-time prohibition act, it is germane and is in order, and the point of order is not sustained.

Mr. GARD. May we have the amendment reported again? The committee wants to be advised whether this amendment will protect this legitimate industry. If it does, I want to vote for it, but I want to vote for something I think will do it.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Is there any parliamentary procedure by this time by which I might ask the chairman of the committee whether or not this might be confined to beer, wine, or other malt or vinous liquors?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can get unanimous consent.

Mr. GARD. I ask unanimous consent, for the purpose of information, in which I think the committee wants to share.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I object. We all understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BENSON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 78.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on this vote I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PELL: Page 2, lines 4 and 5, after the word "liquors," strike out the words "which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol in volume" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "which are by a jury decided to be in fact intoxicating."

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the committee so that that amendment could be heard more clearly.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. GALLIVAN. All right; I do not object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas make the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order.

Mr. GALLIVAN. The gentleman reserved it.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane either to the original war-time prohibition act or to the purpose and intent of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill under consideration or to the war-time prohibition act.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Why, Mr. Chairman, the author of the amendment not having risen, somebody should arise and say something for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order on the amendment.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I am speaking on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe the amendment is absolutely in order. I believe it is germane, and I ask the Chair to consider carefully what the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] has offered.

This is a question as to what percentage of alcohol can be carried in liquor, and the gentleman from New York has offered an amendment suggesting that it be left to a jury. Now, I leave it to the Chair, who is always fair, whether or not that amendment should not be presented to this committee for a vote. I have nothing more to say on the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that this provision is open to any germane amendment, and that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] is in order. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me for one moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair hear me on the point of order? [Cries of "Vote!"] Oh, that does not stop me. I am addressing my remarks to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The Chair has already decided the point of order. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Hooray, for Abilene! [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PELL and Mr. SABATH demanded a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 142.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York demands tellers. As many as are in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-three Members have risen—a sufficient number.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. That demand is not in order. Tellers are ordered. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] will take their places as tellers. As many as are in favor of the amendment will pass between the tellers and be counted.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 143.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 1 of the bill, and I give notice, if that motion should be successful, that I shall move to strike out the balance of Title I.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Strike out section 1.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. GARD. With reference to the motion that the gentleman from Ohio has submitted, is it necessary that he shall offer the same motion at the end of each and every section, and then finally when the title has been completed?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the practice.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under the practice of the House is not my motion correct as I made it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I give notice if this amendment is successful I shall move to strike out all the remaining sections of Title I.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in accordance with the practice of the House. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 132.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are asked for. As many as favor taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-three gentlemen have risen—a sufficient number. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] will take their places as tellers. Those in favor of the amendment will pass between the tellers and be counted.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 129.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I did not hear the announcement of the last vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The announcement was that the ayes were 80 and the noes were 129, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GALLIVAN. "The amendment was not agreed to."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I ask unanimous consent to correct an error that has occurred in the adopting of these amendments. In line 3, after the word "shall," the word "hereafter" has been inserted; and also after the word "be" the word "hereafter" has been inserted. One of those ought to be stricken out. I ask unanimous consent that the word "hereafter" after the word "shall" be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the word "hereafter" inserted after the word "shall," in line 3, be stricken out. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I object.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move that it be stricken out.

Mr. SABATH. A point of order. The Clerk has begun the reading of section 2.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. At the time the amendment was offered I made the point of order that the word "hereafter" had been inserted, and I understood the Chair to sustain my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Chair did not sustain it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, there is a right way and a wrong way to do this. The right way is to move to reconsider at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion would not be in order in the committee.

Mr. GARD. Do I understand the legislative status to be that the gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to section 1 for the purpose of correcting an error in an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was on his feet at the time——

Mr. GARD. We could not understand what the gentleman was saying on account of the confusion in the Hall.

Mr. CANNON. May I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that the word "hereafter" appears twice in the same sentence? What is the use of bothering about it now? When it is reported to the House the House will undoubtedly strike out one or the other of the words "hereafter."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his amendment. The Clerk will read.

Mr. REBER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not know just what the gentleman is going to put into the RECORD. If he will announce to the committee what he is going to put in, I may not object.

Mr. REBER. I would like to extend and revise my remarks along the lines of the remarks I made here on the floor.

Mr. GALLIVAN. About what?

Mr. REBER. About prohibition.

Mr. GALLIVAN. What side were you on?

Mr. REBER. If the gentleman had been here and attending to his duties, he would have known which side I was on.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, still reserving the right to object——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. GALLIVAN. Reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. The right to object can not be reserved when the regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota objects. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, shall investigate and report violations of the war prohibition act to the United States attorney for the district in which committed, who shall be charged with the duty of prosecuting, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, the offenders as in the case of other offenses against laws of the United States; and such Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors may swear out warrants before United States commissioners or other officers or courts authorized to issue the same for the apprehension of such offenders, and may, subject to the control of the said United States attorney, conduct the committing trial for the purpose of having the offenders held for the action of a grand jury.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I wish to invite the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota, who has the bill in charge, to line 18, where provision is made that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants and agents, may conduct the committing trial. I think the gentleman will agree with me that the court conducts the trial, and that after the word "conduct" the words "the prosecution of" should be inserted in line 18, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: Page 2, line 18, after the word "conduct" insert the words "prosecution of."

Mr. MADDEN. That will not make it read just right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I offer an amendment to strike out the word "the" and insert the word "at," so that it will read "conduct the prosecution at the committing trial."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, after the word "conduct" insert the words "prosecution at" and strike out the word "the."

Mr. GARD. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky was not to strike out the word "the."

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order that the amendment should be reduced to writing. You can not have several Members offering an amendment at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from Kentucky is preparing his amendment will the Chair recognize another Member to offer an amendment to that section?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Kentucky is preparing his amendment, which is merely a qualifying phrase. I think we should wait to let him do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of saving time, the Clerk having taken down the gentleman's amendment in writing, does not that answer the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is that the amendment shall be reduced to writing and sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. When the Clerk has reduced it to writing, does not that satisfy the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky had changed his amendment and the Clerk did not have it. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, after the word "conduct," insert the words "the prosecution at."

Mr. RAKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. If the committee adopts this amendment, will an amendment to strike out lines 17, 18, and 19 as amended be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It would.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, has debate been limited on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. No time has been fixed for the limit of debate on this section.

Mr. BEE. May I have the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky? As I understand, with his amendment would not the result be that in the prosecution under this section any layman, any employee, or agent of the Internal-Revenue Commissioner could appear in the court and conduct the prosecution in the face of the statute which exists in most all States that a person presenting a case at the bar, except for himself, must be a member of the bar?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think while that is true Congress can change the rule.

Mr. BEE. Does the gentleman from Kentucky think that it would be proper to permit employees of the Internal-Revenue Department to appear in court and supersede the district attorney in the prosecution of the case?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will interrupt the gentleman by saying that in line 17 it is provided that the one who conducts the prosecution must do so under the control of the United States attorney.

Mr. BEE. I submit to the House that in all the history of jurisprudence there has been no such law which authorizes a layman to come into court and take the place of the prosecuting attorney in the trial of a case. He must be an assistant prosecuting attorney or a member of the bar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is not the trial of a case.

Mr. BEE. Even at the committing trial the rule is the same.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to call attention to the fact that this does not provide for one of these agents or inspectors to carry on the trial except so far as is necessary to bind over the man to the grand jury. These inspectors are doing that now all over the country without being attorneys.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Would not this authorize the agent, not a lawyer, to go before the commissioner at the preliminary investigation and there conduct the investigation as investigations are now conducted by regular admitted members of the bar?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just as they are now conducted by these very agents.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just as is done in every State in the Union. It does not require a regularly admitted attorney; anybody can go before the justice; they can in my State.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. They can not in my State.

Mr. FIELDS. The deputy collectors prosecute cases before the commissioners; they do it in my State.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If the gentleman will permit, the amendment to section 2 contemplates that one though not a member of the bar, an agent or inspector, call him what you will, appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may conduct a legal proceeding before the commissioner that issues the warrant and before whom the case is brought. Is not that so?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. He can not be tried before that court.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am not speaking of the regular trial. I am speaking of the preliminary investigation before the commissioner.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first two words. I am opposed to this amendment unless the gentleman from Kentucky will provide that the inspector and agents visit the House Office Building. Then I will vote for his amendment. Before this debate is concluded I shall ask that every Member of Congress who votes dry on this proposition be honest to his country and his conscience and that he place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the amount of liquor that he has saved up for himself either in his home or in his office. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

Mr. GALLIVAN. If the Congress wants to be on the level with the country, it will do as I ask. We are told——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Oh, sit down. [Laughter.] The country is told that this Congress is overwhelmingly dry. I have been a Member of this Congress since 1914, and I have found it overwhelmingly wet. Now, why—why, in the days when you are making the world safe for democracy and freedom—why tie up the individual unless you are willing, Members of Congress, to tie up yourselves? I have heard, Mr. Chairman, of Members of this House who have said that they have in their private wine cellars enough liquor to take care of them and their friends for 20 years. [Cries of "Name them!"] Mr. Chairman, an inquiry comes from many Members of the House to name them. If they were not good fellows, I would name them. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, let me say a serious word in closing. I know that the Republican Party is in control of this House, as it is of the Senate, and it looks as though in the next presidential election the Republican Party would have it all its own way. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] Oh, I shall stop that applause in a minute, and I will get it over on the Democratic side.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for a question.

Mr. CALDWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do, and I want to ask him to tell me what he was going to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I will tell the gentleman from New York what I was going to say. My last statement was greeted with an uproar of applause on the Republican side of the aisle——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I want to say to the Republicans of this House that they are booting the ball away, and they are bringing our dear old Democratic Party right back to life. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. What is the point of order of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. First, that the House is not in order, and, second, that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the amendment.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Oh, yes, I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the gentleman will confine himself to the amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I made the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word, and in my time I asked the gentleman to tell me what he was about to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is pending.

Mr. CALDWELL. And I asked the gentleman to tell me in my time what he was about to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may do that so long as he confines himself to the amendment under debate, and that is the motion to strike out the last word.

The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I will only take a minute or two. The Republican Party got control of this House in the last national election and, to repeat my language, they are booting the ball away. They do not know how to take care of the affairs of this country, and the grand old Democratic Party will come back next fall in great triumph. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Minnesota is well taken. The gentleman must address his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point that the gentleman from New York who has the floor has yielded.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt.

The committee again divided; and there were—yeas 101, noes 81.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. GARD and Mr. VOLSTEAD) reported that there were—ayes 96, noes 74.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6810 had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD——

Mr. REBER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, all these speeches that go in the RECORD now have got to be confined to this subject; if not, I shall object.

Mr. REBER. My remarks will be on this subject, and nothing else.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What does the gentleman from New York say?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of cooking Army bacon.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject of the bill under consideration. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION OF PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 52).

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 38 of the act approved March 2, 1917 (39 Stat., 951), entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I have the honor to transmit herewith certified copies of each of six franchises granted by the Public Service Commission of Porto Rico. The copies of the franchises inclosed are described in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War transmitting them to me.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 14, 1919.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, with accompanying documents, and ordered printed.

LAWS OF PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 53).

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 8, 1919.

To the House of Representatives:

The undersigned, the Acting Secretary of State, in the absence of the President and Secretary of State from this Capital, has the honor to transmit the following telegram addressed to the Congress of the United States by a unanimous vote of the Polish Diet on July 4, 1919:

"AMERICAN CONGRESS, Washington:

"In this memorable anniversary the Polish Parliament turns its thoughts across the ocean to express to your Nation our greetings and veneration. The first principle of your Declaration of Independence, that every man has right to life, liberty, and happiness, has conquered the world. The Polish Nation will never forget the memorable declaration of the great Chief of your State which proclaimed the nations have the same right to life, liberty, and happiness, declaration which forwarded the world on new paths, which promised to Poland her liberation; declaration which you sealed with your blood. Our nation will never forget that during long years you sheltered millions of our people, to whom their own country, groaning under the yoke of the oppressor, would give neither bread nor work, nor who return now to us penetrated by your principles of dignity of human work. The Polish Nation will never forget your remarkable activity or the unfortunate victims of the war work of real practical Christianity.

"(Signed) TRAMPSYNSKY,
"President of the Diet."

Respectfully submitted.

FRANK L. POLK.

Almighty God, we come to the mount of Thy law with every law that we would write upon our statute books. We can find the conscience of men but by the sanctions of the Divine will revealed to men. Hear us to-day and guide us by Thy holy counsel. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Resolved, That the League of Free Nations Association in accordance with a referendum of its full membership, calls upon all forward-looking citizens to urge the United States Senate:

1. To ratify without reservations the treaty with Germany, including the league of nations covenant.

Such ratification would establish immediate peace, the world's most urgent need in the interest of order and progress; would abolish many international injustices which have proved prolific causes of war, and would create an agency for the rectification of remaining injustices and for the establishment of mutually advantageous and just relations between nations.

2. To accompany its ratification with a resolution, declaring it to be the purpose of the United States, as a member of the league of nations to:

(a) Press for the immediate restoration of Kiao-Chau and the German concessions in Shantung to the Chinese Republic.

(b) Hold that nothing in the treaty or the covenant shall be continued as authorizing interference by the league in internal revolutions; or as preventing genuine redress and readjustment of boundaries, through orderly processes provided by the league, at any time in the future that these may be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the people concerned.

(c) Call for the inclusion of Germany in the council of the league as soon as the new republic shall have entered in good faith upon carrying out the treaty provisions; for the inclusion of Russia as soon as the Russian people establish stable government; and for the full participation of both Germany and Russia on equal footing in all economic intercourse as the best insurance against any reversion to the old scheme of balance of power, economic privilege and war.

(d) Press for the progressive reduction of armaments by all nations.

(e) Throw its whole weight in behalf of such changes in the constitution and such developments in the practice of the league as will make it more democratic in its scheme of representation, its procedure more legislative and less exclusively diplomatic an instrument of growth invigorated and molded by the active, democratic forces of the progressive nations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2259) for the relief of Edward S. Farrow, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 85) thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 1726) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 86) thereon.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1369) to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 87) thereon.

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 120, submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 14th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, and such other expert assistants as may be necessary; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

EXPORTS OF MEAT PRODUCTS.

Mr. LODGE. I report favorably without amendment from the Committee on Foreign Relations the following resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 114) submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 10th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate, at the earliest possible moment, copies of all documents, correspondence, or other papers in its possession relating to its efforts or action in promotion or concerning the export trade in meats from the United States to the Kingdom of Great Britain or any of its colonial dependencies and other countries, and especially any communications by the Federal Trade Commission, or any of its members, officers, agents, or employees with the officers or agents of any foreign Government, and more especially all communications had with the Ministry of Reconstruction of Great Britain or the members thereof appointed in 1918, and to include all correspondence with the Hon. Charles A. McCurdy, Member of Parliament, of the Ministry of Foods and recently chairman of the committee on trusts, also such correspondence with any other member of the Ministry of Reconstruction in relation to the meat industries of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KENYON. I do not rise to object, but merely to ask what the Senator expects the correspondence to show?

Mr. LODGE. I ask the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. The Senator from Illinois introduced the resolution which has just been reported favorably from the committee. The committee reported it without amendment and unanimously. The purpose of the resolution appeared to the committee to be simply to get certain facts in regard to the export of meat products. We saw no reason why the Senate should not have the information.

Mr. KENYON. I realize that there is a propaganda on hand to discredit the Federal Trade Commission and its findings as to the meat industry, and I am anxious to know what the Senator, in a general way, expects to show by the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator suggest that the Committee on Foreign Relations are engaged in such a propaganda?

Mr. KENYON. Not at all, but the Committee on Foreign Relations may not know everything that is going on.

Mr. LODGE. This is a request for information for certain statistics or certain correspondence.

Mr. KENYON. It comes at a time very close to the report of the Federal Trade Commission as to the packers, and it somewhat arouses my suspicions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be glad to inform the Senator of anything I have in mind. I have a letter in my possession dated July 7, 1919, from W. B. Colver, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission. Mr. Colver says:

According to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 27, at page 1985, your remarks are quoted as follows:

"Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. Does he know who the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission is now?

"Mr. POMERENE. I think Mr. Colver is the chairman now.

"Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator know where he is at this time?

"Mr. POMERENE. I do not; I am not my brother's keeper in that respect.

"Mr. SHERMAN. I am not his keeper either, but I believe I have some accurate information about where he is. Unless he has returned recently, he is in England. When the Senator speaks of the fostering care of the Federal Trade Commission on our export trade, I will say that I believe I will have adequate proof to present here that, instead of promoting our export trade, he is destroying it in England by unfriendly comments, by violent speeches reported in English newspapers denouncing certain of our export lines. I think he is paying his traveling expenses across the ocean out of such appropriations as this."

That is the quotation from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He continues in this manner:

I have not had the opportunity to read the RECORD closely every day, and I may have overlooked your presentation of "adequate proof."

If I have, will you be so good as to cite me to the page of the RECORD, and if you have not presented your proof will you advise me when you do so?

That was the letter. I have some proof in my possession, but there is other proof, I think, that can be furnished by the Federal Trade Commission, its members, or some of its employees. It is that that I seek to have. The resolution asks for the information.

I believe that Mr. Colver if not others of the Federal Trade Commission have communicated very unfriendly information to the British authorities, those who are capable of injuring our export trade. If there is nothing of that kind in these records, then the adoption of the resolution will show nothing, of course, and will not be harmful nor will it afford me any information in answering the questions propounded in this letter of Mr. Colver.

I wish the resolution adopted to the end that if there is anything that can be made public in their correspondence with the English authorities that would discourage or tend to discourage the export trade from this country I be given it.

I will say further, Mr. President, I have a considerable volume of information which will tend and some of it will directly show that what I said as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is true. For instance, I have clippings from certain of the London newspapers. I have one from the London Star of April 14, 1919, containing an interview from Mr. Colver. So far as I said he had used violent speeches I am not correct; that is an inaccuracy and I am ready now to make, so far as my present information goes, the correction. But this interview of the 14th of April, in the London Star, is a very hurtful interview. It has a direct tendency not only to damage the export trade but to entirely put the packers of this country out of the British market, not only in England but in all the United Kingdom, and if it is done there naturally the colonial dependencies would probably take the same course.

I wish particularly Mr. Colver or any agent or employee or other member or officer of the Federal Trade Commission to say whether they have had any correspondence along the lines covered in that interview. The interview is enough to establish the truth of the statement I made in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This is the first opportunity I have had to refer to it. This is as follows:

Many people in Smithfield (says a Star correspondent) have been puzzled by the mysterious disappearance from the American meat trust of the firm of Sulzberger & Sons, and the sudden appearance of a new company called Wilson & Co.

Sulzbergers had large dealings with this country, carried out through their agents, Archer & Co., and the story has never been told. It is now revealed in the latest volume of evidence taken by the United States Federal Trade Commission, whose chairman, the Hon. W. B. Colver, has been interviewed in London by a Star representative.

Then follows quite a large matter of alleged statement of fact. I do not care to go into it now because of the time.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask if the Senator is reading from the interview with Mr. Colver?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; it purports to be an interview with Mr. Colver.

Mr. KENYON. Has the Senator read any part of the interview?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not.

Mr. KENYON. What, then, was the Senator reading?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am reading, so far, the heading of the interview, and then follows what purports to be this interview.

Mr. KENYON. From what paper is it?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is from the London Star of April 14, 1919. It is not, I will say, a quotation-mark interview. It states that the reporter of the London Star had an interview with W. B. Colver, and then follow a number of statements about how the firm of Sulzberger & Sons disappeared from the packing business.

I wish to say that, taking the whole of it, this statement is grossly vicious, unfair, and some of it is false.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator know that it is an authentic interview with Mr. Colver?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have clipped it from the London Star.

Mr. KENYON. Where does the Senator get the paper?

Mr. SHERMAN. You can get it in the Congressional Library. You will find the original on file there.

Mr. BORAH. Is there any objection to the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is just waiting to see.

Mr. BORAH. I asked for the reason that if there is objection to it, I prefer that we proceed with morning business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would much prefer that course myself. I was only trying to answer the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I was simply trying to find out about the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care to take it up at this time if there is any objection.

Mr. KENYON. Senators are being flooded now with telegrams. There is a general movement in this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The resolution is before the Senate. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

JAPANESE CONTROL OF SHANTUNG.

Mr. BORAH. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 116, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution, which had been submitted by Mr. BORAH on the 10th instant, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate a copy of any letter or written protest by any member or members of the American peace commission against the disposition or adjustment which was made with reference to Shantung, and particularly a copy of a letter written by Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, member of the peace commission, on behalf of himself, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, and Hon. Henry White, members of the peace commission, protesting against the provisions of the treaty with reference to Shantung.

Any memoranda or other information in the possession of the American peace commission or any member thereof with reference to the attempt of Japan or her peace delegates to intimidate the Chinese peace delegates, and to control the action of said Chinese delegates through and by means of intimidation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senator from Idaho to let the resolution go over. I object to its consideration. I think the Senator is willing to have it go over.

Mr. BORAH. Very well, if the Senator requests it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes to the calendar.

ADDRESS BY GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an address by George Wharton Pepper before the New Jersey Bar Association in Atlantic City, June 14, 1919, on the executive control of international affairs, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE CONTROL OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS.

[Address of George Wharton Pepper before the New Jersey Bar Association in Atlantic City, June 14, 1919.]

I.

"It is not only interesting but highly important for lawyers to determine what the precise function of this group will be within the broad field thus assigned to it. Laymen may be content to affirm or deny that the league sets up a central government or a superstate. Lawyers, however, will not be satisfied until they understand the substance of the matter, irrespective of the terms used to describe it.

"If and when the council meets, each represented nation will in some manner have chosen its delegates. Some one will claim a seat as the representative of the United States of America. When votes are cast in council there will be no limit to the significance attaching to them. The representative of the United States will in effect hold the proxy of this Nation. When he votes he records the decision of 100,000,000 people. Whether, consistently with the Constitution of the United States, the power thus to vote on behalf of the Nation can be conferred on anybody is a constitutional question which I do not propose to discuss. I raise the more fundamental question whether the principle of representative action can in fact be so extended as to clothe one man with the uncontrolled authority to commit 100,000,000.

"If the executive council of the league was limited in function to advisory action, the question of representation would still be important. If, as I shall presently show, the vote of the council may actually bind member States in great international emergencies, then the reality of representation becomes not merely important but vital. The aim of the league is to keep the peace of the world after the world shall have made peace. Few things are more likely to breathe discord and precipitate war than the attempt to hold a great nation to a position marked out for it by the action of a single individual, no matter how wise or how trustworthy.

"It is difficult to discuss current international events without seeming to criticize individual statesmen. And yet it can not be wise to shut our eyes and to seal our lips in the presence of object lessons from which there is much to learn.

"With this thought in mind, and solely in connection with the point I am discussing, I direct your attention to what I believe to be one of the most fruitful sources of discord in the United States, and therefore in the world, to-day. I refer to the fact that in regard to matters of world concern the President of the United States has assumed what I believe to be the absolutely impossible task of interpreting and expressing the mind and will of his fellow countrymen.

"There is much heated debate respecting the President's wisdom or unwisdom in declining to seek the advice of the Senate. Without controversy, this at least may be said, that when the Senate and the President act together the people have some check upon solitary Executive action. It may not be a sufficient check. It may not be the wisest kind of a check. But until a better is devised and applied few lawyers will deny that the cooperation of the executive and the legislative departments of the Government is a great safeguard against the kind of solitary Executive action which in extreme cases tends to revolution.

"Senators have lately been engaging in a technical discussion as to whether the draft of a treaty should be made public while it is in process of negotiation. It seems to me that they lose sight of the point which is vital in the present situation, namely, that the so-called negotiation is not being conducted by commissioners who will in due time report to the Executive, who, in his turn, will submit the product of negotiation to the Senate, but by the Chief Executive himself, whose every act and every utterance must necessarily be interpreted as so far committing the Nation that a Senator who ventures to speak out is branded as one who is embarrassing the President and a citizen who ventures to protest must submit to charges of disloyalty. For such a situation we have no precedent in our constitutional history. The question is not whether the President acts wisely when he makes himself a commissioner. The point is that if and when the Chief Executive acts as a commissioner he must either consult with the legislative department at each step of the negotiation or arouse the spirit of discord which is always bred when multitudes of people question the reality of the representation by which they are sought to be bound.

"I call this a contemporary object-lesson, because we are asked to incorporate permanently in the structure of a peace league a theory of representative action which at the present moment is producing grave internal dissatisfaction throughout the country. If our representative in the executive council is appointed by the President alone, the danger will reach its maximum. But if he is chosen by the Congress, or even by popular vote, he will still be placed in an impossible position with his own constituents the very first time a great world question comes before the council for decision. When he undertakes to tell the council and the world how the United States votes on the question at issue he will necessarily arouse the resentment and even the passion of millions of our own people. If one man can express the mind and will of this Nation, why do we have a Congress and a Supreme Court? Why not elect the President by direct popular vote and intrust to him and to his Cabinet the permanent control of all national interests?

"What I have said is intended to direct your attention to the probable effect on Americans of action taken in council by the unfortunate person who is called upon to discharge an impossible duty. What will be the effect of councilor action upon the 36 nations not even nominally represented in the council it is not very difficult to predict.

"This league is not worth while unless it is to be a peace league. It will not prove to be a peace league if the people of member States are constantly thrown into discord and dissension by the well-meant but futile efforts of single individuals to express the national will. It will not prove to be a peace league if States not represented in the council find themselves from time to time committed by the votes of a central authority over which they have not even a nominal control or influence.

II.

"I come now to the proposition referred to a moment ago—that this central group of nine men are in fact given by the covenant the power in every great international emergency to determine the policy and conduct of member States.

"It can not successfully be denied that each league member is bound by covenant to submit to this council of nine all serious disputes of any and every kind which the parties do not unite in arbitrating. Nor can it be denied that in a certain contingency the nation against whom the council decides is bound not to go to war with the successful disputant. The contingency in which a sovereign State is thus bound is that in which there is a unanimous verdict against it by the members of the council not parties to the dispute.

"I pause to note a point often overlooked. It is this, that when nations agree with respect to all manner of future disputes to be bound by the vote of other nations, they are creating a central authority invested with sovereign powers. Whether this central organization shall or shall not be called a 'superstate' is purely a matter of definition.

"The important fact is that when such a system is set up member States have thereby abdicated their right to determine their own course in multitudes of emergencies and have conferred that right upon a body created for the purpose.

"It makes no difference, as a matter of principle, whether the verdict by which a nation is to be bound must be given unanimously by other nations or whether a bare majority vote will suffice. The important point is that when once the action of one nation can be determined by the vote of other nations the line has been crossed which separates diplomatic conference from governmental action. Each member has suffered itself to be built into the structure of a larger governmental concern, much as a kingdom is built into the structure of an empire.

"The international agreement to arbitrate a particular question or a particular class of questions obviously stands on a different basis. The plan embodied in the covenant contemplates the decision by the central body of all questions on all subjects and at all times. The covenant makes it the specific duty of the council to deal with disputes which the parties do not recognize as suitable for arbitration. In other words, the jurisdiction of the council begins where the possibility of arbitration ends.

"Some of the confusion of thought on this subject betrayed by advocates of the league has been due to the fact that the provisions of the covenant creating the central government are expressed in eighteenth century terms of social contract. The fiction of a promise to act in accordance with the central decision is substituted for the language of compulsion. But the consequences are the same. It would be entirely possible to rewrite the Constitution of the United States in terms of social contract. Instead of enumerating the powers of Congress the framers might have drafted a covenant by citizens and States to submit themselves to such action as Congress might take. A breach of the covenant would be an act of lawlessness and prescribed consequences would follow.

"In the case of the league these consequences are sufficiently serious.

"Let it be supposed that the United States and Japan are parties to a dispute over the validity of our immigration policy and that the matter has been referred to the council. Let it further be supposed that the other seven nations in council, against our protest, have decided that this is not a matter purely within our domestic jurisdiction and on the merits of the question have decided against us and in favor of Japan. Let it likewise be supposed that the Mikado thereupon sends a shipload of subjects to San Francisco under battleship convoy and attempts to land them. The United States is bound by its covenant not to go to war against the successful disputant. But let us imagine that the instinct of self-preservation is too strong for us and that we are smarting under a sense of injustice. We fire on the Japanese ships, prevent the landing, and precipitate war.

"What follows?

"The answer given by article 16 is that this act of war on our part against Japan is an act of war against all league members. Instantly each member State becomes bound to subject the United States to a social, commercial, and economic boycott of the most pitiless sort, and it becomes the duty of the council to recommend to the several Governments the military and naval quotas to be contributed by each 'to protect the covenants" i. e., to enforce the decrees of the league.

"Nobody doubts but that such a situation as I have supposed would be disastrous to the United States. The most that an advocate of the league can say is that this precise situation will not arise. Perhaps not. But history is full of such situations and history has a way of repeating itself. Why should we take so great a chance when the essential value of the league can be preserved by amputating these political excrescences?

"It is to be noted also that there is a financial aspect of situations like the one just suggested. The cost of any war precipitated by a breach of covenant is underwritten by all league members. The United States, under article 16, must contribute a large part of the financing of a distant war in which we may have only a remote concern.

"I have said that there is no international dispute of any kind which may not be dealt with by the council. Among other purely political or nonjusticiable matters the council may determine the following:

"First. Whether a protest by the United States under the Monroe doctrine tends to the maintenance of peace and, if not, may bind us by a decision that the protest is invalid and may safely be disregarded by our adversary.

"Second. Whether a given matter (such as immigration, coastwise trade, protective tariff, status of the Panama Canal) is or is not of purely domestic jurisdiction and, if not, may make a binding decree against us on the merits of the question raised by our adversary.

"Third. Whether the United States has properly discharged its duties as mandatory for some weaker nation, and, if not, to what extent we shall be surcharged.

"Fourth. Whether in any case involving sovereign and national self-determination we are right or wrong in the position we have taken, and what course of conduct the other nation may pursue toward us with the sanction and support of the league and in view of our covenant not to resort to war.

"If the foregoing analysis is correct, three points will have been made clear:

"First. That the league of nations has as its central agency a voting trust of nine nations dominated by five.

"Second. That the voting trustees who act for the several nations have power to decide great and vital questions of national self-interest for member States and to bind them by their decision.

"Third. That while an American is to be one of nine delegates in the council it is from the nature of things impossible that he can express the mind and will of his fellow countrymen otherwise than by a representation which is merely fictional.

III.

"My next point is that the central governmental agency thus set up by the covenant must in all cases resort to executive action rather than to legislative or judicial action and will by so doing produce world-wide discontent, friction, and war.

"In the last analysis every organized government must place its main reliance upon a legislature, a court, or an executive.

"England trusts Parliament, and Parliament has proved the palladium of English liberties.

"We in the United States have learned that the success of our constitutional experiment has resulted from the vesting of judicial power in the Supreme Court.

"Germany trusted the executive, and, as always, executive action quickly lapsed into tyranny. The Kaiser was nothing more than the embodiment of a primitive governmental conception, an unhampered executive with a little court and an embryonic legislature to play with. Given these conditions, everything that followed was a matter of course.

"The covenant of the league of nations sets up a central governmental agency which is the executive raised to its highest power. The so-called assembly is a clumsy and superfluous institution. One doubts whether it will ever meet. If it does, and if it undertakes to decide disputes referred to it by the council or by a party, the principle of majority rule in international affairs will become even more obvious than in the council, for a decision of the assembly becomes binding if made by the nations represented in the council supplemented by a bare majority of the rest—19 out of 36, of which 19 votes Great Britain will cast 5.

"It is not too much to ask that lawyers will consider carefully what it means thus wholly to subordinate the legislative and the judicial function to the executive. In war times, in the interest of strong and vigorous rather than of just and acceptable action, we were willing to make large delegations of authority to the executive. I doubt, however, whether any calm political thinker in America will advocate the indefinite prolongation of this system of executive control for our own affairs, let alone for the affairs of the world. Yet the covenant of the league proposes to perpetuate for the world and under normal conditions such a predominance of the executive function as will turn peace into war even more certainly than it can crown war with victory.

"The fact that there are nine executives rather than one is not material. Four of them are confessedly negligible, and are treated as such. Of the other five, four will represent the powers that dominated the peace conference. Of these four, three have actually been in the assembly. Among the three at any given time the position of commanding influence will be accorded to one.

"What is really proposed is that we should vest executive, legislative, and judicial power for the government of the world in a voting trusteeship dominated by two or three men.

"What we are actually contemplating is an offensive and defensive political alliance for the permanent control of international affairs, coupled with a liberal guaranty of American force to make the alliance effective and a pledge of American capital to finance the wars of the world.

IV.

"An effective way to test the soundness of the foregoing analysis is to inquire whether those who are responsible for the league will consent to the amendments necessary to meet the objections which have here been raised.

"Three simple amendments would suffice to transform this league from a war league into a peace league. If these amendments are refused, the refusal goes a long way toward proving that the determination to set up a strong international government is of the essence of the plan.

"The three amendments are these:

"First. Strike out the covenant which now binds member States to accept the action of the council or assembly and by striking them out transform those bodies into useful international councils of conciliation.

"Second. Create a court of international justice with a compulsory jurisdiction over all justiciable disputes.

"Third. Eliminate from the covenant the blanket guaranties of article 10 and incorporate in the treaty such definite and specific guaranties by the United States and other league members as are requisite to make the treaty settlements actually effective.

"It will not do to refuse to make amendments on the ground that the evils at which they are aimed do not exist. The answer is that multitudes of wise, intelligent, and patriotic citizens actually perceive these grave elements of danger in the document. No group of men should indulge pride of intellect to the extent of declaring that there is only one side to the questions which I have been discussing. The alleged mechanical difficulties in the way of making amendments are purely imaginary. The document can readily be amended if people are in earnest about it.

"A refusal to agree to these amendments is inconsistent with a sincere belief in free government and is consistent only with a settled determination to establish and maintain a centralized executive control of world affairs."

ADDRESS BY THOMAS PATTERSON.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I ask that an address by Thomas Patterson, of the Pittsburgh (Pa.) bar, one of the leading lawyers of Pennsylvania, giving a summary of the league of nations, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

[By Thomas Patterson, Esq., of the Pittsburgh (Pa.) Bar.]

"What is known as government by organic law—that is, government under a fixed constitution to which legislation must conform—is a matter of comparatively recent date and limited area. Until within recent years all governments, of whatever form, were entirely free to act in accordance with their pleasure as the occasion arose. While they often called important legislation constitutional legislation, yet, in fact, such legislation could be changed at any moment by act of parliament or legislature in the usual method.

"The idea of constitutional restriction probably had its rise in the royal charters of the American colonies. In some of those charters there were contained provisions which prohibited legislation on certain subjects, or provided that certain tenures should be established or customs adopted which the colonial legislature could not change. This idea took larger shape, involving the fundamental union of different colonies, in the Albany convention of 1763, and later in the Articles of Confederation and the Constitution of the United States.

"In the history which has been made under the latter instrument, we get most of our knowledge of the practical working result of an organic instrument binding together a number of units, over which a central power, created and limited by the Constitution which is the basis of the Union, exercises authority.

"One of the first points to be noted about this constitutional history is that the character and effect of the Constitution as discussed by statesmen at the time of its adoption is entirely different from its character and effect as worked out through judicial decisions and in political history. Originally the Constitution was regarded as a mere league, interfering with the sovereignty of the several States only to the extent that those States had clearly given up specific rights. All powers not given directly or by necessary implication remained with the States.

"When the Constitution came up for adoption by the Virginia convention, Patrick Henry very strongly opposed it, because Virginia, then by far the largest and richest of the colonies, was yielding her independence to some unknown sovereignty, which might later on reduce her to a passive or subject condition, and in support of his argument he called attention to the opening line of the preamble of the Constitution, 'We, the people of the United States.' He was at once answered by James Madison, who had been a member of the constitutional convention, and who said that the words had no meaning, except that, as the framers of the instrument did not know the States which were to sign the agreement, they could not name the States, but they used the term in the sense of 'the people of the States united by this Constitution.' He further said that a most superficial inspection of the document showed that it was entirely a Union of the States and executed in the nature of a treaty in their capacity as States. If it were a Union of the people, the people of the States would decide by a vote of all the people of the States whether to adopt or reject it. The representation in the Senate was by States and amendment to the instrument could only be made by States.

"This argument prevailed. Virginia approved the instrument. Later on the constitutional lawyers of the North—Webster, Marshall, and Story—took precisely the position which Patrick Henry had indicated, that the Union was of the people and not of the States, and that secession, therefore, was illegal, because the Union was not a federation between the States, but an instrument adopted by the people of the States, and a Union of the people and not of communities.

"The answer of the southern lawyers, along the lines which Madison had already indicated in his speech to the Virginia convention, may well be regarded as the better legal argument. The point to be especially noticed, however, is that it was not a question of what was intended by the framers of the Constitution or the people who adopted it, nor what was the logical and legal construction of its various phrases, but the fact that the Constitution had placed the supreme power in the Federal Government; that it had given it control of the Army and Navy, the mint, the post office, and the other elements of national life. It had denied the States all of these rights and prohibited them from maintaining any standing army or from negotiating any treaty between the different States, so that when the Southern States made their desperate effort to tear loose from a Union which had become obnoxious to them they found themselves confronted not by the arguments of lawyers showing that their act was illegal, but by the overwhelming national force opposed to them, and, in spite of their determined and courageous efforts, they were fated to defeat from the start. After the Navy of the United States had laid its strangle hold upon the southern ports, preventing all commerce from entering or departing from those States, the fact that it must before a great while perish was absolutely determined.

"Far from criticizing our Constitution, I think that even the forces once opposed to it would concede that its preservation had been most beneficial, but we see by this incident the results which follow failure to clearly define both purpose and power, in both which respects our Constitution is incomparably clearer than the covenants of the league.

"So we may note that it was not what Madison or Henry or others who argued for or against the Constitution said it would mean that counted at all in the history of the matter, but it was the actual disposition of the powers and the creation of a paramount central authority which determined the result of the controversy.

"Another matter of interest to be noted is that the tendency of the Federal Government has always been toward the extension of its powers. This has not only been accomplished by a course of decision of the Supreme Court, which has naturally enough sought to weld the various State elements into a unified whole, but the course of public thought, of legislation, and of amendment has been one to steadily increase the powers of the Central Government and reduce and limit the powers of the local or State governments. So that, looking back, I think we will all agree that the constitutional history has been one of steady but increasing centralization, until the State lines are almost at the point of disappearing. Yet a result such as this was one of the last things that the framers of the Constitution or the people who adopted it thought it possible to happen. It is what the people who act under a Constitution, not the people who theorize a priori think about it, that is determinative. And this has been accomplished under regulation and control by one of the most conservative bodies of the world—the Supreme Court of the United States, who have, beyond question, earnestly sought not to warp nor disturb the meaning of the Constitution, but to try to apply it in an enlightened sense, according to its spirit.

"With such aids as these brief lessons of our own constitutional history have given us, let us examine for a moment the proposed world federation which comes before us with the title of 'the league of nations.'

"The scope and purpose of the Constitution of the United States are very clearly defined. The reason for its being called into existence, as a necessary protective measure against destruction by the great European powers, also serves sharply to define and make clear its real intent.

"In the case of the league of nations we are at a loss to find any definition that can be laid down so as to give us any accurate limitation of the field of jurisdiction of the proposed federation. We know that international peace is not its sole object. We have, also, 'international cooperation,' whatever that may mean. We know, again, that the assembly, which is its paramount body, 'may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.' What this sphere of action may be, outside the peace of the world and outside international cooperation, whatever the latter term may mean, we are left in doubt, except that we find among the general objects the securing of harmonious conditions of labor, and for this purpose the establishment and maintenance of international organizations; the just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under the control of the league; supervision over the execution of agreements in regard to certain prohibited traffics and trade in arms; freedom of communication and transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all the members of the league. It would seem quite apparent that, with so general and vague an outline or description of the field of operations of the league, that field of operations may, in fact, include almost anything in which, for the time being, the nations of the world, or some of them, may be thought to have an interest.

"It is also important to note that the ordinary division into executive, legislative, and judicial powers, which former constitutions always recognized, is not made here. The ordinary action is by the executive council. Final action lies with the assembly. These bodies, if they act at all, must act by some sort of legislation. If the legislation is to be executed, they must appoint executives to carry it out, and there is no court or judicial body that can declare that such legislation or action is beyond the scope of the powers with which the league is invested. In other words, we have a situation in which the central authority is the sole judge of the limits of its powers and the method by which it will carry them into effect.

"With all history pointing, as it does, toward the increase of power in central authority, even when limited by independent judicial supervision, it seems quite apparent that if the league should become an established fact and should exist throughout the years its tendency would be to steadily increase its autocratic authority, and this course is greatly accentuated in the present case by the entirely vague and loosely formed declarations as to what the scope of authority of the league is intended to be.

"This naturally leads us up to the question of sovereignty. It has been much debated whether or not the authorities of the league could enforce upon unwilling nations its will in matters in which those nations might be unwilling to acquiesce. The answer must be that the league is paramount and supreme within the sphere of activity for which it is created. As noted above, what that sphere is is a matter which the councils of the league must determine, but, whatever it may be, within that sphere the powers of the league must be absolutely supreme. That was the ruling of the Supreme Court in the case of the Federal Constitution and must be the ruling of whatever authorities are charged with the execution of the activities of the league. This necessarily follows from the very nature of a constitution. If one of the constituent units may define the powers of the league and resist its authority, when the sovereignty of the league has been destroyed, then there is an end of the federation. Unless it can speak with authority, it need not speak at all. It does not exist at all for governmental purposes. It would be merely a clearing house, through which the views of nations could be exchanged and action of concerted character decided upon or rejected. And this could be done as well without the league as with it. But more than that, it is perfectly apparent by the relations which the powers of the league are given toward the military establishments in the various units, toward the treaties which are made between those units, toward the punishment of offending nations who refuse to obey its decrees, and the summoning of forces to its aid to carry out the decrees, that the purpose was to create a sovereign power, within the limits of its jurisdiction. As it necessarily must be intended, the league shall be given all necessary power to carry out its edicts or judgments which are to be supreme. Nothing else can be the meaning of such a phrase as that in article 15, referring to the punishment of a covenant-breaking State and the action of the remaining States:

"They (the remaining States) will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory for forces of any of the members of the league which are cooperating to protect the covenants of the league.

"In like manner the provisions as to the trade in arms, the inspection of all munition plants, arms, naval and military programs of the various units, speak the same language.

"Let it be conceded that this is a necessary thing, as has been pointed out. If the league be a league at all, then it must have the power to enforce its decrees, and it must have the authority to determine the scope of its jurisdiction. The purpose plainly exists and the necessary powers are given. If there were nothing else, the language, which is repeated, of protecting the covenants of the league by force, would be conclusive upon this subject.

"I need not recall the argument, which is too well known to need repetition, that it is beyond the constitutional powers of the Senate and the Chief Executive to enter into a covenant which shall surrender any part of the sovereignty of the United States. I am only considering for a moment the practical effect which might happen, and therefore must be regarded as bound to happen, if the United States should become a constituent member of the league. Whether or not our relations with Mexico or with the Orient; our admission of emigrants to citizenship from any of those countries; our relations of trade with them or with Europe were subject matter within the jurisdiction of the league of nations is one on which, doubtless, arguments could be heard, but the decision would rest with the councils of the league. Whatever the conclusion they might reach in any given case would have to become the law governing this country in that matter. If it is answered that a country may withdraw from the league upon two years' notice, the answer is apparent that within those two years infinite damage might be inflicted, and that even with this period of secession given a nation might well be so reduced in its military forces as to be unable to withstand coercion if at the time the rest of the world believed that course was desirable. In addition to that, upon what possible theory should a nation accept obligations and enter into covenants of association and alliance where the only possible answer given to its loss of sovereignty would be that it may, after a period, win free and regain such part of its sovereignty as may not have been permanently affected?

"The reasons put forward for the adoption of the league, or for the entrance of this country into the league, of the smallness of the world, of the cause of humanity, of the horrors of war do not seem to me to touch the question at all. The history of this country has not been one of oppression nor of overarmament nor of seeking quarrels either on this continent or beyond the sea. While we have had wars, with little or no preparation for the war on either side, yet to-day I think it may truly be said that no nation has to build a ship or raise an army or build a fort in preparedness for any aggressive act on the part of the United States. Our 3,000-mile boundary line along Canada with not a fort nor a soldier to mark that line is sufficient evidence of what our history has been in relation to international peace.

"What possible call of humanity is there to lead us to undertake to constitute a part of the police force to guard the other side of the world? Prior to the outbreak of the war in Europe most Americans did not even know the names of many of the nations which became involved in that war or their location or the character of their governments. We can contribute nothing in the way of wise policy, and we certainly ought not to be required to contribute anything in the way of force to limit the boundaries or maintain the integrity or suppress violence among those far-distant peoples. In like manner these peoples, as well as the larger nations of Europe, ought not to be called upon, and if called upon could not wisely act, in the settlement of disputes which might arise with our neighbors on this continent or in the East.

"It is an old saying that one may not have efficiency without responsibility. If our country is to keep its guardian place in the New World, it must have the full responsibility for its actions. It can not efficiently perform these functions if the nations of the Old World may reach over its shoulders at any time and determine for it the course of action it should pursue or the decision it should reach.

"If there is any single reason for the cause of humanity that we should interfere for the sake of the world's peace, the case would be different, but it is perfectly apparent that the nations of the Old World, gathered together in any league or treaty they may see fit to adopt or enact, can, if they are of united purpose, successfully reduce their armaments and successfully make common cause against any aggressive warfare, so that such aggressive warfare will cease even to be contemplated. But if, unlikely as it may be, the cause of humanity ever should beckon us to give assistance to the peoples of the Old World, that assistance can be given when the time comes as readily and strongly as it has been done in the past, and all the more efficiently and strongly because this Nation has been permitted to grow up and pursue its destiny unhampered by the restrictions of a league which makes its soldiery, its armament, its Navy, and all its other facilities of defense subject to inspection and regulation from abroad.

"In conclusion, as it seems to me, the questions which are raised here and elsewhere as to the desirability of the league present, at least, arguable matter. If we are at all right in the objections expressed to the league of nations, then the most serious crisis which the American people have encountered since they formed their country is now upon them. Upon what possible theory is debate eliminated and discussion made wrong in regard to a matter so interwoven with all our political history and so fraught with possibilities of evil and harm for our future? Without any criticism of the motives of the Chief Executive, and conceding to him no other purpose than to secure ideal conditions for the world, we must not forget that the history of all republics has been the elimination of the bodies representing the people from the councils of the State and the substitution therefor of the act of the executive. The people, without any thought of disloyalty, care nothing for courts or Congress. They only ask an executive who shall carry out their wishes at the time. The executive, in like manner, naturally and sincerely cares only to interpret and carry forward the wishes of the people. The constant tendency always has been to eliminate any traditional or constitutional provisions intended to act as a check upon the actions of the executive department. There can be no more striking instance of that than the proposition that the treaty of peace should receive automatic approval at once and as a matter of course by the Senate, and not only that, but, as a part of it and automatically and without objection, the Senate should approve and enter into the league of nations.

"Whatever may be the right course or the wrong course in regard to the league, whatever may be the call of humanity or the call of wisdom in relation to this country and the other nations of the world, as evidenced by the league, it certainly seems clear that not only is it due the importance of the subject considered, but it is due the preservation and protection of our own institutions in their most vital aspect that there should be a free and full discussion of the proposed league on its own merits, quite separate and apart from the European peace, a peace which should not be delayed against the clamors of all mankind by coupling with it and requiring automatic acceptance of covenants surrendering the sovereignty of our country."

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a summary of the league of nations prepared by Maj. Gen. William Crozier.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

[By Maj. Gen. William Crozier.]

"The peace treaty having been finally signed, and being about to be taken up for formal consideration by the Senate as soon as it can be physically gotten before that body, an estimate of the status to which the scattered debate and the discussion in the public press have brought it has a greater interest now than at any previous time, and a correct estimate ought to afford some indication of the chance of the treaty's ratification.

"Significant difference of opinion, of course, centers about the covenant of the league of nations, which the intense opposition of its opponents in the Senate failed to cause the conferees to omit from the treaty, and it is there as Part I. It can fairly be said that no other features of the treaty have given rise to such objection in the Senate as to jeopardize the ratification if the differences in regard to the covenant can be composed. The points in the covenant which have given rise to the most controversy are found in articles 1, 8, 10, and 15.

"The last paragraph of article 1 provides for the withdrawal of a nation from the league upon two years' notice, provided that all of its obligations shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal. Mr. Root, in a letter to Mr. LODGE of June 19, 1919, called attention to the fact that a claim of unfulfilled obligations ought not to operate to keep a nation wishing to withdraw indefinitely in the league, and proposed a reservation in language explaining a corresponding understanding. As it is undoubtedly the intention to permit withdrawal there would probably be no objection to a reservation for making the intention effective.

"Article 8 relates to the limitation of armaments, and provides, among other things, that plans for the limitation having been adopted by the several governments the limits fixed shall not be exceeded without the consent of the council of the league. As the covenant itself contemplates war under certain contingencies this provision can only relate to the peace-time armaments of the nations, since it would be absurd for a nation to go to war under an agreement forbidding it to increase its armed forces. An explanatory reservation to this effect would probably not meet with objection.

"Article 10 is familiar as the one containing the undertaking to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league against external aggression. It has given rise to a great deal of controversy, and Mr. Root in his letter to Senator LODGE advised against its acceptance, pointing out the danger of attempting to commit our people to the forcible preservation in the future of boundaries in which their interest would be small and their sympathies might be on opposite sides. But another objection may be raised against article 10, in that it guarantees the integrity and political independence of countries where, perhaps, these attributes ought not to be guaranteed. For example, we think we waged a righteous war against Spain, and for a good object, namely, the freeing of Cuba from the inefficient sovereignty of the old country; but the process impaired the territorial integrity of Spain, which if the covenant had been in force at the time not only would we have been under engagement to respect but the other member nations would have promised to preserve against our assaults upon it.

"Also, in accomplishing what we have in San Domingo we have undoubtedly impaired, temporarily we hope, the political independence of that country, very much to the advantage of the world, including the Dominicans.

"Other examples might be given in which it would have been unfortunate to respect the political independence of a backward country in which government was not carried on in the interest of the governed and where there was no semblance of the consent of the governed to the exercise of governmental powers, because the governed were too ignorant to give or to withhold any effective consent. There have been and still are such countries, and respect of their political independence is more unfortunate for their own inhabitants than for anybody else.

"Article 10 selects two attributes of the member nations and undertakes to guarantee them, but article 11 declares any threat of war to be a matter of concern to the whole league, and would seem to cover sufficiently aggression against territorial integrity or political independence without a special article for these latter. It is true, however, that we are setting up a number of new nations, and it would perhaps not be inadvisable to help guarantee their boundaries for a short time, until the important neighboring nations should have time to arrange for their protection. It would certainly seem to be more their task than ours. If, therefore, the Senate should ratify the treaty with the reservation that the United States would not be bound by article 10 beyond a certain date, it would free us from the objectionable indefinite engagement, and ought not to constitute an amendment which would require immediate reconsideration of the treaty by the conferees.

"There remains article 15, which is the most important article in the covenant in that it is the one which prescribes the method for the peaceful settlement of all international disputes which are not submitted to arbitration. It is intended to cover all matters of antagonistic policy, which have been the most fruitful causes of the world's wars. In the article the member nations agree that they will submit to the council of the league or to the assembly any dispute likely to lead to a rupture which is not submitted to arbitration, and that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the conclusions reached. This is very far-reaching, and it is worth while to examine the procedure and see how it would have worked out in some of the disputes in which we have been engaged and which we thought sufficiently important to be worth fighting about.

"Coming back to the Spanish War, it will be remembered that we went into this war because of the long-continued disorder in Cuba, which ample trial had shown Spain to be unable to cure, and of which the crowning evidence had been the destruction of our war vessel in the harbor of Habana, the Spanish Government being unable to prevent the destruction or to tell who had been guilty of it. After many ineffective warnings, we made up our minds that the only effective remedy lay in the expulsion of the Spanish power from the island. That is, we concluded that Cuba must be withdrawn from the sovereignty of Spain and given her independence. Of course, we would have preferred to secure relief through peaceful means, and if the league of nations had been in existence, under the proposed covenant we should have examined the possibility of relief through the action of a court of arbitration. We could have filed a complaint against Spain, and could probably have counted upon securing from the court an order based upon a finding that the state of affairs in Cuba constituted a nuisance, and to the effect that Spain should abate the nuisance by restoring order. But this is just what we had concluded that Spain, after years of trial, was unable to do; and the order of the court would have left us no further along toward our purpose of relief than we had been before. To try to give effect to such an order would simply have meant more delay and the further endurance of the nuisance. What was considered necessary was, as stated above, the termination of the Spanish sovereignty in Cuba, but this a court would not have had the power to grant, since it would have involved a revolutionary change, and courts can not be revolutionary but must be guided by the law and the precedent and the established order.

"We would therefore have had to abandon the idea of relief through a court and must have turned to the council or the assembly under article 15. Spain would undoubtedly have preferred a judicial settlement, since her title to sovereignty was well established in the law of nations, and a court would have had to respect it; but the only chance of a peaceful settlement in our favor would have been with a body which would not have been bound to as close a view of the case as a court would have been and could have sought a solution in a wider field than the law. In such a search it would have been seen that a less radical action than the termination of the Spanish sovereignty in Cuba might be taken by a recommendation that autonomous government should be established in the island, and, although such recommendation would have bordered very closely on the interference with internal affairs, which is explained to be beyond the province of the league, we have good reason for believing that Spain would have accepted the recommendation, in face of the alternative of war, and would have promised to set up such a government. But we believed that Spain would not be able to carry out the promise, through lack of power and through lack of qualified agents for the difficult task of establishing self-government in a backward country like Cuba, with a large percentage of illiterate inhabitants. We had already considered the suggestion of such a solution and were convinced that it would only have meant more delay and the longer endurance of a situation which had already been endured too long. How well our belief was justified was shown by our own subsequent experience in Cuba, where, notwithstanding our long practice of popular government, we had to take possession of her governmental machinery a second time and run it for years after we had originally installed the machinery by our well-skilled agents and had watched its operation from our advantageous position of proximity.

"Seeking further a solution we found nothing short of the complete withdrawal of Spain from Cuba, which was the conclusion which we arrived at after long and earnest consideration of the problem, in which we were animated by a most sincere desire to avoid war. But the league would have been absolutely barred from granting this solution by the covenant in article 10; and even without this covenant it is impossible to find anything in the proposed scheme for the league which grants it international legislative power, of which a supreme example would be the power to alienate from a nation's sovereignty a portion of its domain. The possession of such power would constitute the league a veritable supergovernment. Here we would have run against a great difficulty, the inability of the league to grant the only relief which we, after long suffering, believed to be adequate. Yet we would have been under a hard and fast agreement not to apply the remedy of war until after we had endured the delay of submitting the matter to the league, notwithstanding the evident futility of such a process.

"It may be argued that having endured the situation for so many years, we might very well have supported it for the additional time necessary to submit the matter to the league, when the council or the assembly would have soon seen that they could not reach a recommendation of a peaceful settlement, and we would have been free to go ahead with the war. But it is not certain that this would have been the conclusion. We can well remember that there was a strong aversion on the Continent of Europe to having this war take place. Our motives were distrusted, annexation of Cuba being believed to be one of them. Nobody else was suffering particularly from the disorder in Cuba, and in such cases the pressing necessity for relief is not apt to be appreciated by those not suffering. A strong effort was made to bring the concert of Europe to bear in at least limiting the war to American waters.

"The heads of all the diplomatic missions in Washington went in a body to the White House to discourage the war. We had one friend across the Atlantic which prevented action by the concert of Europe, and under the covenant we might have counted upon this friend, perhaps, to prevent a unanimous recommendation of some other course than the only adequate one of war. But European statesmen are conservative, with a strong tendency to remain within the law and the precedent and to discourage revolutionary proceedings; our position before the council would therefore have been a precarious one, with a distinct possibility of a unanimous recommendation that something like the autonomous government scheme be tried.

"So important a matter would probably have been carried by one of the parties or by the council to the assembly, and in that body we would have met the fact that Latin America has never been easy in its mind over our patronizing attitude and the intentions behind it, and would have had the suspicions of its members, and probably their votes, to prevent our freedom to use force in applying to the situation the only remedy which our mature consideration had led us to admit as adequate. It seems difficult to avoid the conclusion that the league, under the proposed covenant, could not have met the situation and could not have brought about as good a result as the war did, either for ourselves, for Cuba, or for the rest of the world, including Spain, if what we hear of the effect of her relief from her colonial burden is true.

"Other examples of the inadequacy of the proposed covenant can be found without going outside our own history, if it had been in operation at the time of our various crises and its terms had been lived up to. In our war of 1812 the casus belli was the impressment into the British service of seamen who were found on American vessels, upon the visitation and search which the British warships had a right to make. High American authorities have since admitted that this practice was sanctioned by previous usage; and the underlying idea of our contention was the new one of the alienability of allegiance, which at that time, and even for many years after, we did not formally put forth ourselves. As the mistakes of Americans for Englishmen were of a kind which were not likely to be made as between other nationalities, it is probable that a council or an assembly of a league of nations would have retained the well-established practice, and we would have been left without relief. Our Revolutionary War and our Civil War were not international, and therefore would not have come under the covenant, but they both afford very good illustrations of the way in which the principles of article 13 and article 15 would have brought about different results from the better ones of the wars. The cause of our Mexican War, having been a boundary dispute, might have been judicially settled, and we would have had a chance of winning out before a court; but it is the only war in which we would have had a fair chance of winning our case before a league, and it is the one which we have ourselves found the most difficult to defend.

"Article 21 of the covenant reserves the validity of the Monroe doctrine, and it has been proposed to make the reservation more explicit by a declaration, upon ratification, that nothing in the treaty shall be construed to require the submission by the United States of its policy regarding questions which it deems purely American to the decision or recommendation of other powers. The covenant itself, as well as the proposed declaration, undoubtedly indicate an admission that we need greater security than that which article 15 affords in regard to these American questions, by which we set great store. Is it consistent, then, to commit ourselves to article 15 in all unforeseen questions of policy which may not be American, such as questions affecting the Philippine Islands, for example, in some of which our policy may be at variance with established international law, as it was in the War of 1812 and in the case of the Spanish sovereignty in Cuba? A precedent, constituting the international law, may at any time become outworn and be a misfit in a new situation.

"The reservation in the covenant in regard to the Monroe doctrine, and the proposed reservation in regard to all American questions, deny the jurisdiction of the league over such questions, even for purposes of inquiry. In order to show good will toward the purposes of article 15 a less rigid attitude than this might be assumed, and the right of the league to investigate even American questions of dispute might be admitted, while reserving to ourselves freedom to take such final action as our national conscience would dictate to be necessary. We could thus agree to communicate to the secretary general the statement of our case with all the relevant facts and papers, and could facilitate in every way the most open examination; but should keep in our own hands the final decision as to policy. This is the fundamental reservation which must be made if we intend to preserve for our people a national policy in accordance with our own standards, instead of subjecting the policy to the standards of a body of heterogeneous membership, part of which we know to be less advanced than our own. In the conference which has negotiated the treaty itself we are not without example of the way in which injustice may be admitted in order to facilitate some other ends, and it would be something more than unfortunate if we should find ourselves obliged to endure similar injustice because we had made a general agreement not to resist a conclusion by force.

"The reservation with regard to article 15 is the least which we must insist upon if we are to preserve real national independence; but it does not leave the covenant other than an instrument of tremendous force. Article 11, in declaring any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, a matter of concern to the whole league, takes very advanced ground as compared with anything which the nations have agreed to heretofore. In cases of the outbreak of hostilities in which we ourselves, for example, were not interested directly, we have always made our neutrality our first concern, and have embraced it and cherished it as something which we would not be driven from except in the last extremity. We are now, in accepting article 11, abandoning this position; and we can face squarely about from it by further strengthening the article by resolution, declaring that we will be found in any matter which threatens war, with intention to use our power to coerce an unjustified aggressor, or to state why we do not think, upon inquiry, that such action on our part is called for.

"Still further action in the interest of enforcing peace might be taken in connection with the ratification of the treaty. At various conferences the principal nations of the world have agreed upon certain rules for the government of their relations with one another. These rules have formed the best kind of international law, having been formally accepted by all the parties to whom they applied. But they have never been given any sanction. That is, the nations have not put any backbone in them by agreeing to stand behind their enforcement, or to punish or otherwise take cognizance of their infraction. It would not at any previous time have been possible to do so. Action in resentment of their violation has been left entirely to the injured party. Among the rules which have been flagrantly violated in the great European war are many which are contained in the Convention for the Laws of War on Land, and in the Convention on the Rights and Duties of Neutrals, of The Hague conferences. The unsatisfactory status of these rules would be improved by a resolution declaring it to be the policy of the United States to take cognizance of any violation of them, whether it should itself be directly injured by the violation or not, and to take action for the enforcement of the rules, or to state why it would not consider such action to be appropriate in the particular circumstances.

"If a league with machinery constituted about as provided for in the covenant of the league of nations, notwithstanding the reservations above proposed, had been in existence in the summer of 1914, a sharp reminder would have been sent to the Central Powers, by the United States among others, to the effect that machinery would be set in motion to ascertain the merits of the impending conflict, and that our intervention might be expected if an intention of unwarranted disturbance of the peace should be disclosed. Similar action would have been taken by England, who, as things were, did not feel justified in intervening until the neutrality of Belgium had been actually violated and her own treaty guaranty had been thus challenged. Contrast of our own resulting position with the one which we actually did assume shows enough difference to justify the presumption of a different effect upon the war. We not only made the usual prompt announcement of neutrality but we stated through the mouths of our public officials that we would not even proceed with prudent defensive armament for fear that such action might be interpreted as preparation for taking part in the war.

"It would be unfortunate if we should enter into a treaty containing an obligation which the people of no great nation would live up to when a question of maximum importance should arise. At a time of tremendous stress it is more than doubtful if such a people would be bound by any paper promises made by an earlier generation, and, once infringed, there would be danger that the whole structure of the covenant would come tumbling down. It would be better that our structure should be solid, if more modest, and that conviction of its serviceability should come with practice in its use. If we pile more promises of performance upon a substructure of supposed mutual understanding throughout the whole world than our knowledge of one another warrants, we may find ourselves at the first storm with nothing left us but a heap of ruins. Our gaze, anxiously fixed upon Europe, has not in the last half year discovered such ease in composing differences of interest, even by nations just ending a struggle side by side against a common enemy, as to justify confidence in committing our own vital interests to the custody of what would be in effect a world legislature, without reservation and with agreement to accept the outcome.

"Let us therefore acknowledge our membership in the family of nations and recognize responsibility for a man's part in the family affairs by strengthening our adherence to the principles of article 11 of the covenant. This article contains the essential and vigorous features of the program of the League to Enforce Peace, as stated by Mr. Taft:

> The member nations "jointly to use forthwith both their economic and military forces against any one of their number making war against another before submitting the issue to either the court or the council of conciliation, and * * * that the league should determine what action, if any, should be taken in respect to recommendations of the council of conciliation in which the parties concerned did not acquiesce."

"Indeed, the article is more comprehensive than Mr. Taft's statement, in that it embraces in its contemplation others as well as members of the league. Neither binds a nation subjectively to accept a conclusion of the council. A stalwart intention with reference to article 11 and a dignified reservation with reference to the peaceful method of article 15 would redeem the treaty from the charge of containing a 'soft' covenant, which is the kind that would probably be favored by all those who desired a soft peace. The covenant would then embody a new state of mind, as compared with that which has animated the world heretofore, and it would be well to practice with it for a while with a view to its improvement."

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the article of ex-President Taft in yesterday's Washington Post.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAFT SAYS IF UNITED STATES BACKS OUT OF ARTICLE 10 THE LEAGUE WILL BE ENDANGERED—DECLARES FRANCE AND SMALLER NATIONS WOULD ASK FURTHER CONFERENCES IF ROOT'S SUGGESTIONS WERE FOLLOWED—CALLS FORMER SENATOR'S REASONING, INVOLVING OBJECTIONS OF OUR FOREIGN-BORN CITIZENS, "CURIOUS."

[By William Howard Taft.]

"Mr. Root's letter to Mr. LODGE raises two questions that will bear discussion. He suggests reservations instead of amendments in the ratification, and says that they need not and will not delay the going into effect of the treaty of peace. He says many precedents justify this view. This statement needs analysis in order to understand it and its weight.

"A treaty is a contract. The minds of the contracting parties must meet before it becomes binding on either. One party can not change the contract after the other has agreed to it, and bind the other party to the change, without the other's acquiescence to it. Strictly speaking, a reservation in the consent of the Senate to a signed treaty, though the reservation be only one of interpretation, must be concurred in by the other party if the reservation is to play any future part in construing the treaty. Otherwise, the reservation is merely an ineffective expression of opinion by the Senate. This was the case in the Spanish treaty, where, after ratification, the Senate passed a resolution as to what it meant by its ratification. The Supreme Court held that it had no effect in construing the treaty.

TREATY-MAKING PROCEDURE.

"The ordinary procedure in treaty-making is first the drafting and signing of the treaty by the plenipotentiaries of the contracting Governments. The signed duplicates of the treaty are referred back to the Governments, to be ratified by them. These ratifications are then exchanged between the contracting Governments and each Government makes known, in its own way, the treaty thus agreed to. It is in the procedure of exchanging the ratifications that such reservations as Mr. Root speaks of are acquiesced in and become part of the treaty. If the ratification of the United States, for instance, contains a reservation to which the Government receiving it makes no objection it may be held to acquiesce in the reservation contained in the ratification of the United States, and thus to agree to make it part of the treaty.

"There is no real distinction in principle between reservations and amendments, but important amendments are not usually incorporated in treaties in this easy, silent, and summary way. The nation receiving a reservation in a ratification would naturally require further negotiation and the conference, if the reservation changes materially the obligation of the parties to the treaty.

PRECEDENTS NOT IMPORTANT.

"The precedents to which Mr. Root refers, therefore, are not important in deciding the question, which his letter raises as to article 10, because the question in each case always is whether the reservation or amendment is so important that the other nations are not likely to let it go without question. If they do not, then negotiations must be resumed and the delay which Mr. Root seeks to avoid must occur. The issue, therefore, is whether the other nations in receiving a ratification of the United States containing a reservation refusing to consent to article 10 and striking it out of the obligations of the United States under the treaty, would accept the ratification, without demanding, as they would have the right, further negotiations before consenting to this change.

"The anxiety of France to strengthen her defense against Germany, apparent throughout the proceedings of the conference, indicates that she would ask further conference. Her representatives labored to secure a provision in the league covenant under which a permanent international police force will be constantly under arms and under a general staff, to act instantly in defense of league members subject to unprovoked attack.

SECURED PROMISES OF BOTH.

"More than this, she secured the promise of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Lloyd-George to present to their respective Governments a special defensive treaty securing the instant action of England and the United States in case of an unprovoked attack by Germany. We can reasonably surmise, therefore, that France would seriously object to eliminating an article furnishing her some defense against such attack, however short it may fall of her earnestly expressed wish.

"Moreover, other and smaller nations would probably object. The importance of the article in the whole plan of the league is manifest. It is the inducement by which the weaker nations are brought into a league. It is the chief protection which the league offers them. The fact that the United States, with its great prestige, its disinterestedness, and its moral influence, as well as its military potentiality, is under the obligation of article 10 constitutes the great cautionary and minatory effect of that article, making it powerful as an agency in restraining wars of conquest. If the United States is to back out of the article, the league will be weakened. The nations, great and small, interested in the league, therefore, will not be likely to pass over such an amendment lightly, but will naturally insist on a reexamination of the whole covenant when its character is thus materially changed.

ARGUMENT A CURIOUS ONE.

"Mr. Root's argument that we should refuse consent to article 10 because some of our foreign-born citizens may object to our helping to discipline their native countries under the article is a curious one in view of the lessons of the war just ended. We probably had more natives from Germany than from any one country in our citizenship when we went to war with Germany. Nothing came under more bitter condemnation than their hyphenated citizenship and their opposition to the war. The question which Mr. Root's objection raises, therefore, is whether, after this experience, we are to allow those who seek refuge in our country and enjoy the boon of our freedom and institutions to restrain us from doing our duty and sharing the burden of the world in maintaining peace.

"Shall we thus officially recognize and acquiesce in the generally condemned hyphenated Americanism? Shall we avowedly allow it to influence our future international relations? One of our great national aims, now insisted on, is a more complete Americanization of our foreign-born citizens. Is no reform to be brought about in this regard? Is anticipation of this continued evil to deter us from a course full of world usefulness?"

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two editorials on the subject of the league of nations and two brief addresses by myself on the same and other current issues.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"'PITILESS PUBLICITY' DEMANDED.

"WASHINGTON, July —.

"The Republican Publicity Association, through its president, Hon. Jonathan Bourne, jr., to-day gave out the following statement from its Washington headquarters:

"'Before the peace treaty with its annexed league of nations covenant is finally disposed of by the Senate the Committee on Foreign Relations owes it to the country to conduct hearings and demonstrate the truth or falsity of the various stories of the peace conference that have come to us from time to time. In spite of the fact that the treaty, and particularly the league covenant contained in it, is fraught with more tremendous consequences to the American people than any document that has come before them since the adoption of the Constitution, practically the only source of information concerning the negotiations has been the partially censored press. The country knows absolutely nothing of the bargains that were made among the delegates to the peace conference in order that the signatures of all the nations might be obtained, and no intimation has been allowed to escape as to the authorship of many of the most important provisions.

"'But although they have been denied authoritative information as the conference progressed, the people have drawn their own conclusions on certain phases of the treaty and covenant that should either be substantiated or proved incorrect. That the committee can easily do by calling before it the members of the personnel of the American delegation and taking their testimony under oath. By combining their statements a connected and accurate story of the proceedings can be obtained, and the people will know at last in what manner their liberties have been trafficked and bartered. Among other things it should be demonstrated—

"'1. Is Mr. Wilson the principal author of article 10 of the league covenant, by which we would be bound for all time to preserve "the territorial integrity and existing political independence" of all members of the league? Such an inference is a natural one, inasmuch as the President used those precise phrases in a speech in January, 1916, in which he advocated similar guaranties for the American Republics.

"'2. Why does Mr. Wilson insist that the absurd language of article 21 protects the Monroe doctrine, particularly in view of the fact that English authorities positively assert that it does nothing of the kind?

"'3. Under what theory was it that the British Empire has six votes in the league while the United States and other nations are allowed but one each?

"'4. Why was the British Empire given control, in the form of mandatories, of about four-fifths of the captured German colonial territory; this in spite of the fact that the British Empire already controlled one-quarter of the total land area of the whole world?

"'5. What was the so-called American scheme for a league of nations; in what respect did it differ from and why was it discarded in favor of the British plan?

"'6. Just what were the considerations that induced Mr. Wilson to agree to urge upon the Senate an alliance guaranteeing protection to France in the event of another war with Germany?

"'7. Is it not a fact that upon the rejection of the league of nations by the United States Senate it will be promptly discarded by the other signatory nations and a separate peace with Germany proceeded with immediately?

"'8. Was there an accurate report, stenographic or otherwise, kept of the proceedings of the various commissions which transacted the real work of the peace conference? If so, is there any reason why the Senate should not be put in possession of a copy of every such record?

"'9. What is the true and unabridged story of the China-Japan-Shantung controversy?

"'10. Where did Mr. Wilson derive his authority, either as President of the United States or as its peace commissioner, to issue what amounted to an appeal to the Italian people to overthrow their government?

"'11. Why should a portion of the Turkish Empire be selected for administration by the United States as mandatory? If this country must be a mandatory for any captured territory, why not select that which formerly belonged to the country with which we were at war—Germany—and which is certainly far more desirable than a province peopled by the unspeakable Turk?

"'These are but a few of the mysteries that confront the American people, which it is their right to have cleared up before they bind themselves under terms that involve those questions. The power that vitalizes a treaty originates in the people. The individuals who represent them in the conference have behind them no possessions of their own with which to negotiate. They merely draw up a tentative arrangement that must be submitted for approval or rejection to the people through their representatives in the Senate. In order that that action may be intelligent the Senate and the public should have in their possession all the data that was available to the negotiators themselves. It is within the power of the Foreign Relations Committee to get it.

"'Not only should these questions receive pitiless publicity in order to insure proper action on the treaty, but it must not be forgotten that the Democratic Party will have as its candidate for the Presidency next year the individual who headed our peace delegation or a man who entertains the same views. It is essential that all the facts surrounding the activities of Mr. Wilson in Paris should be brought to light that the people may know what sort of Americanism has actuated him. If he has proven faithless to his trust to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States," the voters should know it in order that he or the candidate who embodies his views may be properly rebuked at the polls. It may even transpire that the evidence is of such a character as to warrant laying it before the House for appropriate action under the impeachment clause of the Constitution. In any event we should have it before us as a basis for future action.'"

AMERICANISM WITH PEACE OR INTERNATIONALISM WITH WAR?

[Persistent efforts are being made to cajole the public into the belief that the league of nations is a "league for peace." To prove the utter falsity of that assertion the Republican Publicity Association, through its president, Hon. Jonathan Bourne, jr., herewith presents an analysis of the covenant by articles, clearly demonstrating that the adoption by the United States of the proposed league of nations means war, not peace.]

"The stock argument of the proponents of the covenant for a league of nations has been that the undertaking will prove an instrument for world peace. They have even gone so far as to characterize it as a 'league of peace,' and its opponents have been denounced as preferring war, as trying to make political capital at the expense of the peace of the world, and as putting obstacles in the way of the future happiness of mankind. Going before the people with their pleas to support the league if they wanted peace, the league advocates have won many individuals to their cause who have accepted the statements of the agitators at their face value without troubling themselves to see if they were borne out by facts. But take the peace cry away from the league advocates and there is nothing left on which to base their claims for support of the covenant.

"The whole structure of the league is centered about the idea of compulsion. Starting with a council of the representatives of nine States, really dominated by three nations, or two, if the United States stays out, it is proposed to subjugate all the rest of the world to its will. The very essence of the covenant is force, to be exerted on any nation which, in the opinion of the council, is not comporting itself according to the rules laid down in the covenant and interpreted by the council.

"The covenant bristles with limitations and restrictions on independent nationalism that will prove a constant irritation to countries accustomed to determine their own affairs free from foreign interference. Almost every article in the covenant, save those that deal purely with administrative routine, has in it the essentials for the creation of friction likely to lead to war between nations; in fact, some of them not only tend to war but make war automatic and compulsory.

"Article 1, in defining the method of withdrawal of a nation from the league, says that two years' notice must be given of the intention to withdraw, and even then permission will not be granted unless the council by unanimous vote decides that that nation's league obligations have been fulfilled. Under those conditions the United States once in would be compelled to remain a member, by international force of arms if necessary, if Japan or Greece or Spain chose to make us do so. The resentment of red-blooded Americans to coercion from such sources would inevitably lead to war.

"Articles 2 and 3 are purely administrative.

"Article 4 states that each member of the league shall have one vote in the assembly. Here, again, is a fruitful source of irritation. Liberia, Cuba, and Panama owe their very existence to the United States, which set them up as independent nations and has acted as a potential guarantor of their integrity ever since. Here the creator is controlled by its creations, which are given three times the voting strength of the power that made them. Other nations that depend for the maintenance of their independent sovereignty on the American Monroe doctrine are given equal voting power in the league assembly with the great people who protect them. Haiti, Salvador, Nicaragua, Guatemala, and Honduras are cases in point. Is the United States likely to submit tamely when, perchance, those little Central American Republics raise a question inimical to the welfare of our country and proceed to outvote us 5 to 1?

"Article 5 stipulates that 'decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.' Certain exceptions of minor importance are made to that rule, but it holds good in the settlement of all questions of great moment. The complications that are sure to arise from the application of this regulation are endless, each of them certain to produce international tension that will lead to war if its strict enforcement is insisted upon by the league members. Germany is soon to be a member, and as such could effectually veto any policy that we might formulate toward Mexico. Inasmuch as the Germans were active in fomenting an anti-American attitude in Mexico during the war, it is not difficult to foresee her policy when she is in the league. Our interference in Cuba to save that country from Spanish oppression could and would have been prevented had the league been in operation in 1898. One nation registering its objection to our Cuban policy would have necessitated its cancellation, and the horrors of Spanish rule in the island would have continued. In short every State in the league, big or little, has the power within itself to invalidate the actions of all the others combined. The moment that arrogant authority, granted by the league covenant itself, is sought to be exercised war will follow unless this great Republic of the United States and the peoples of the world are to be directed by a lot of unstable nations, large or small, in problems which they do not understand and are not capable of solving.

"Article 6 provides for the appointment of the first secretary general of the league and authorizes him to appoint the secretaries and all other members of the league staff. That official has already been named. He is an Englishman of note, and doubtless a very worthy and able gentleman—but an Englishman, with all that the word implies. If there is one trait that distinguishes a British citizen above all others it is loyalty to king and country. Everything is subordinated to service of the Empire. Every incident in English history is a separate incentive to the Britisher to think of his country first, last, and all the time. The secretary of the league, with his absolute power to appoint subordinates, will see to it that the personnel, if not composed entirely of Englishmen like himself, are completely amenable to his dictation. How will Americans like that situation, and are they likely to accept it with submissive acquiescence? Would we not feel a little resentful if every official in our own Senate and House of Representatives was an Englishman? Yet in this supergovernment, clothed with power to override almost anything our own Congress may do, the entire secretarial work, including the care of the archives, is under the complete jurisdiction of England. Is that a tendency toward peace or war?

"Article 7 establishes the seat of the league at Geneva. That means that our destinies are to be determined by a court sitting 3,000 miles distant from our own shores, only a cable connecting us with the proceedings, and even that means of communication subject to such censorship restrictions as may be prescribed at the time. Our experiences during the war have shown how easy it is for all news from across the water to be denied us when the officials so decree. The location of the headquarters of the league at Geneva simply means that the question of our participation in world wars, of tremendous taxation on our people, of life or death to our soldiers, and of our commercial relations with other nations of the world, are to be considered and determined behind closed doors, so far as our keeping in touch with them is concerned. Is that state of affairs likely to promote peace and contentment, or will it probably engender irritation likely to find expression in armed resentment?

"Article 8 relates to disarmament. It provides that the council, 'taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State,' shall plan the reductions in the armies and navies of the several nations. After those plans have been accepted they shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council. Here is the situation proposed: Each nation submits a report of its military and naval strength to the council of nine, and those gentlemen, putting their wisdom of the affairs of all nations ahead of the knowledge possessed by the representatives of those nations themselves, proceed to cut down and pare away armies and navies according to their own conception of national needs. England, seeing at once the danger of such an arrangement, has made a reservation that, no matter what is done, the supremacy of her fleet shall not be endangered. The United States, on the other hand, would be completely at the mercy of the council, dominated as it will be by eight foreign votes to our one. Is that a situation into which you want to project your country, and are we going to accept with equanimity the judgment of that council when it orders us to dismantle our modern battleships, remove fortifications from our coasts and the Panama Canal, and destroy our Army organization that has been built up at such fearful cost? Do you believe in putting in the hands of foreigners the power to run riot and ad libitum with our national defenses?

"The last paragraph of article 8 obligates the members of league to 'interchange full and frank information' of the 'condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to warlike purposes.' Which of our industries is not 'adaptable to warlike purposes?' In the last two years practically every industry in this country has been working for the success of our armies, with more or less direct application of its product to the actual fighting. This provision of the covenant means nothing more or less than the publication of every trade secret that enters into the success of American industry. Even patents may be construed to come within the definition of 'full and frank information.' Industrially, this paragraph puts our manufacturers completely at the mercy of foreign competitors who care to take advantage of the opportunity it affords. Again, do you think such a course is wise, either from your standpoint as an American citizen or as a member of humanity in general? Article 8, purporting to turn swords into ploughshares, carries almost in its every word the germs of future wars, and is nicely calculated to excite deep-seated animosities sure to lead to international bloodshed if the irritating cause is continued.

"Article 9 provides for the creation of a permanent commission to advise the council on the execution of the military and naval questions involved in articles 1 and 8. It is not stated what authority shall appoint the members of the commission, but probably the council will make the appointments and the national complexion of the commission will be akin to that of the council. The activities of such a body of experts will merely add a touch of refinement to the decisions of the council and accentuate the world-wide resentment by which its decisions will be received.

"Article 10 breathes war from its first word to the last. This is the provision that pledges member nations to preserve the 'territorial integrity and existing political independence' of every member of the league. Its acceptance by the United States is certain to involve this country in foreign wars with States with which we have no quarrel and perhaps are on the most friendly terms. The sentiment of the article is the direct antithesis of peace. It proposes to extend to all the world every local disturbance, precisely as the dispute between Serbia and Austria involved the nations of both hemispheres. It is preposterous to call the covenant a 'league for peace' when it contains such a mandatory summons to war. Article 10 alone is sufficient to damn the league covenant forever in the eyes of everyone who really wishes to see a step taken in the direction of future peace.

"Article 11 is nothing more or less than an automatic declaration of war for every member of the league. Its opening sentence reads as follows:

"Any war or threat or war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league.

"Under this provision the United States, if a member, immediately becomes involved in every war of the future, no matter how remote from our own shores, regardless of our relations with the parties to the dispute, or our desire to remain at peace. Our soldiers and sailors, to all intents and purposes, automatically become hirelings of the league, subject to orders to proceed to the scene of bloodshed and fight against the country that the council may deem to be in the wrong. Do you want to send your boys off on such a mission? What becomes of the 'league-for-peace' cry in the light of this article?

"Article 12 includes an agreement by member nations to submit to arbitration or to the council any dispute in which they may be involved, and not to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report of the council. It is provided that in such cases the arbitrators shall submit their award 'within a reasonable time' and the council 'within six months.' Suppose the dispute had been submitted to the council, then a period of nine months may elapse before a nation is permitted to vindicate its right by force of arms. Meanwhile it must stand idly by and witness perhaps the destruction of its civilization, the murder of its nationals, and the overthrow of its government. This provision is really a prohibition against the establishment of peace. If you find your family menaced by a gang of thugs, you are prevented from raising a finger in protest until the matter has been thoroughly thrashed out by a regularly constituted board of umpires. Is that a theory you wish to see applied to the United States in its dealings with Mexico, for instance? Article 12 is an insurance of war rather than a step toward peace.

"Article 13, like the provisions that precede it, contemplates war, but under different circumstances. After providing for the reference of disputes to arbitration and the award of the arbitrators, the article reads, 'In the event of any failure to carry out such an award, the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.' The ominous meaning of that declaration is apparent. The nation that declines to abide by the decision of a council, stacked 8 to 1 against it, is to feel the full force of such 'steps' as the council may prescribe. In other words, war will be waged against the disobedient nation until it is willing to subjugate itself to the will of the league. Here, again, we have war, not peace, with the United States inevitably involved if it shall be a member of the league.

"Article 14 stipulates that the council shall formulate 'plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice.' Inasmuch as the council, the secretariat, and the assembly are dominated by England, it is not difficult to forecast the complexion of the court. While it is not mandatory for a nation to submit its disputes to that particular court, the inference is plain that such a reference is expected. Article 14 does not have the elements of friction in it possessed by most of the other sections of the covenant, but it is easy to see that disagreements and misunderstandings, liable to lead to open rupture, may arise from the judgments of such a court.

"Article 15 is the section that pretends to reserve so-called domestic questions for determination by the nation concerned, free from interference by the league. This is the article under which England will reserve to herself the determination of the Irish problem. Insurrection and bloodshed may run rampant in Ireland for all that the league of nations will do to prevent it. Likewise, revolution may disrupt every country on the face of the globe before the league will step in with its courts of arbitration, council, assembly, and other machinery for 'peace' to bring about a cessation of the carnage. The inconsistency of the league as an agent for peace is conclusively demonstrated by this article. Members of the same national family may murder each other with impunity, but let one of them shoot somebody on the other side of the border, and the league awakes to the fact that there is trouble brewing for humanity and fusses about to find a remedy.

"Article 16 prescribes in considerable detail the methods that will be followed by the league in enforcing its decrees. The moment a nation resorts to war to preserve its national honor in disregard of the obstacles to prompt action put in its path by the covenant it is to feel the might of the league. A world boycott is to be instituted against the offending State at once. All 'financial, commercial, or personal intercourse' with the rest of the world is to be severed, and an international army and navy, recruited from the military strength of the other member nations, are to proceed against the offender. Article 16 is war from start to finish. Force without stint is the prescription set forth in its language.

"Article 17 offers membership in the league to a nation party to a dispute likely to lead to war. If such nation declines to enter the league and assume its obligations, and undertakes to settle its own affairs in its own way, then the drastic punishment prescribed in article 16 will descend upon it. War again! This time it is to come as a measure of coercion to compel a nation to enter the league and yield up its sovereignty to the dictation of foreigners. Let a country assert its independence and evince a determination to mind its own business and compel its neighbors to mind theirs, and its lands are to be laid waste by this 'league for peace,' its nationals slaughtered in the defense of their homes, and the country as a national entity destroyed.

"Article 18 prevents any future treaty from taking effect until it shall have first been registered with the secretary general of the league. This transcends completely the treaty-making power of the Senate, and prevents the consummation of treaties designed to promote amity between nations unless they shall have taken the course prescribed by the meddling league. Let a country undertake to enter into a separate agreement with its neighbor, as every nation has a perfect right to do, and it is immediately liable to all the rigors of military and economic pressure that the league can bring to bear. Situations have often arisen in the past when the interference of a third party in the treaty agreements between two nations have led to war, and it is easily conceivable that they may be repeated in the future.

"Article 19 empowers the assembly to advise member nations to reconsider treaties that the assembly thinks have become inapplicable. No compulsion to change such treaties is contained in the article, but the inference is plain or the provision would never have been included in the covenant. England, it is understood, intends to reserve the treaty of alliance she has with Japan, but what will happen to other nations that persist in keeping their international obligations is a matter of conjecture.

"Article 20 goes a step further than 19 and binds members of the league to abrogate all obligations or understandings inconsistent with the terms of the covenant. That means that a member nation, having a treaty with a nonmember nation, shall immediately repudiate its written word. Such a state of affairs has been productive of wars from time immemorial. Germany started hostilities by repudiating her treaty with Belgium and invading that unhappy country. But the league actually proposes to make such repudiations mandatory. Any self-respecting nation that is thus flouted by another with which it has a solemn undertaking is justified in resorting to arms, and such will be the result of a general application of the principle enunciated in article 20.

"Article 21 is declared by President Wilson to preserve the Monroe doctrine. English authorities say it does nothing of the sort. Here is a clash even before the league becomes an actuality. Suppose we proceed on the theory that our Monroe doctrine is not invaded by the league and undertake to enforce its restrictions against foreign States. Immediately there is conflict with the league, and it becomes incumbent upon us to retreat from our position or fight. We are at once confronted with the alternative of abject surrender or war.

"Article 22 is the one under which mandatories are to be provided for weak States. It is suggested that Armenia and possibly Constantinople are to be allotted to the United States. Think of the millions of dollars and scores of precious American lives that will be sacrificed if we undertake the policing of that portion of the Turkish Empire. However great our compassion for the sufferings of the Armenians, are we ready to send armies for their protection against the cruel Turk? Actual war may not result from article 22, but unnecessary shedding of good American blood is inevitable if we assume the obligations that it contemplates.

"Article 23, among other things, declares that members 'will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communication and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the league.' This is a vague and dangerous obligation for any nation to assume, full of pitfalls if it is to be literally enforced. This is another world guarantee, this time of a commercial nature, to which every nation becomes a party. Is the United States to insure the inviolability of the commerce of Hedjaz, for instance, or Czechoslovakia or Serbia or Siam? Contemplate, if you can, the manifold complications in which we would become involved were we to adopt such obligations, any one of which might easily plunge us into war if our duty was conscientiously performed.

"Article 24 places all international bureaus under the direction of the league. That means that the Pan-American Union, designed to foster more amicable relations between the American republics, shall move its headquarters from Washington and become a part of the organization of the league at Geneva. The Union heretofore has been a power for peace, enabling the United States to keep in close touch with affairs to the south of us. With its relegation to far-away Switzerland, much of its potency in that direction will be lost.

"Article 25 contains an agreement to encourage national Red Cross organizations, having as purposes 'the mitigation of suffering throughout the world.' Probably a belated realization of the world trouble that will be hatched the moment the league becomes a reality prompted its authors to insert this encouragement to the Red Cross, so that it will be prepared for what is to come.

"Article 26 prescribes the method of amendment of the covenant. Before taking effect an amendment must receive the unanimous vote of the council, and also a majority of the assembly. Such restrictions make it practically impossible for an individual State to succeed in getting amendments that it desires, and a failure to do so is bound to lead to strained relations and possibly open rupture. Compulsion is the keynote of this article, as it is of the whole covenant.

"During our life as a Nation we have not enjoyed uninterrupted peace. But the wars in which we have been engaged concerned issues directly affecting our national life and welfare. Any man who would have suggested that we rush into Asia to settle a controversy between China and Japan would have been branded as insane. It never entered anybody's head in 1904 that we should interfere by force in the Russian-Japanese War. Yet each and every one of the Old World conflicts that take place in the future is to be made 'a matter of concern' to the United States, and we are to become embroiled in it if we subscribe to the obligations of the league covenant.

"A policy of Americanism means that we go to war only to protect our country from foreign aggression. The policy of internationalism embodied in the league means that we go to war to protect every other country on the face of the globe from foreign aggression. Which do you prefer? Is it to be 'Americanism with peace, or internationalism with war?'"

AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

[Speech of Senator POINDEXTER at Rochester, N. Y., July 4, 1919.]

"It is of deep significance that as Americans gather to-day to celebrate the severance of their union with a European power it is proposed by the highest authorities in the land that we should form again a union with European powers. The establishment of American independence has had a more profound effect upon civilization and the destinies of man than any other event in history. Sir Edward Creasy in his Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World says:

"The war which rent away the North American Colonies from England is, of all subjects in history, the most painful for an Englishman to dwell on. It was commenced and carried on by the British ministry in iniquity and folly, and it was concluded in disaster and shame. But the contemplation of it can not be evaded by the historian, however much it may be abhorred. Nor can any military event be said to have exercised more important influence on the future fortunes of mankind than the complete defeat of Burgoyne's expedition in 1777; a defeat which rescued the revolted colonists from certain subjections, and which, by inducing the courts of France and Spain to attack England in their behalf, insured the independence of the United States and the formation of that trans-Atlantic power which not only America but both Europe and Asia now see and feel.

"When Miltiades, with a small force, pierced the center of the Persian hosts on the Plain of Marathon and drove them into the sea the question of whether the ideals of Greece or those of Asia should govern the western world was decided forever.

"When Charles Martel, 'The Hammer,' broke the power of the all-conquering Saracens at Tours, Europe and its colonies of the west were saved for Christianity from the doctrines of the Moslem faith.

"When Cornwallis laid down his sword at Yorktown, the doctrines of the natural rights of man and of government by the people were planted upon the earth, never to perish.

"By the extraordinary blessings of Providence a race of statesmen and soldiers, without equal in all the annals of men in their combination of talent and virtue, was raised up in America to take advantage of the great opportunity. Without the divine inspiration of Henry, which enabled him to look beyond the forms and precedents of government, and the flaming genius of his eloquence, which aroused the people, independence could not have been achieved. It needed also the patience, the infallible judgment, the military genius, the self-devotion of Washington; and to fix in the stable forms of government the liberty which they had won required also the practical statesmanship and wise business sagacity of Jefferson, Hamilton, Franklin, and their great associates.

"Through the influence of this example France was led and strengthened to make her fight for liberty and to plant the banners of republican government in the midst of the imperial standards of Europe. By this great example also the subject peoples of Latin America raised the standard of freedom, and the movement of liberty thus begun was placed upon a permanent foundation by the enunciation of the Monroe doctrine, which placed the aegis of the great Republic between the weak peoples of the New World and the ambitions of European kings.

"For a hundred and forty-three years we have celebrated on each anniversary the declaration of our independence from a European power. For a hundred and forty-three years, under a Government that emphasizes the liberty of the individual and minimizes the interference of the State on the great field of the North American Continent our race has expanded in the mighty drama of the West. Under the conditions established by the inspired fathers and leaders of the Republic, our people as a Nation have risen to the highest state of man. We have set up as the supreme object of society the happiness of the citizen rather than the grandeur of the Government; and yet we have proved the paradox that the government which is the servant of its people is the most powerful among the nations. For a century and a half the spirit of liberty and self-reliance was developed in the necessities and adventures of colonial life. It was planted, as their very essence, in the bills of rights, the charters of liberty, the constitutions and laws of the States and of the Union, and for a century and a half it has shaped the issues of our national life. It found preeminent expression in the Declaration of Independence, and its temple of safety in the Constitution of the United States. It is to that spirit of liberty we pay tribute to-day. We gather to worship at its shrine for our own spiritual exaltation and that the fires on the holy altar of freedom may never grow dim. American liberty is the genuine liberty and not the fatal and spurious liberty of Bolshevism, which means the death of freedom, and which, while parading as liberty, is in truth the most pitiless despotism ever practiced, either among savage tribes or civilized nations. American liberty is the liberty of law. It is voluntary subjection of a self-governing people to laws made by themselves, in which no class is recognized, and the rights of person and property are regarded as sacred, as the very foundations of liberty.

"Now for 300 years, at first loosely associated as neighboring Colonies, with the same body of laws, the same traditions of liberty and security, similar conditions and ambitions, and then as one Nation, our people have been the most fortunate of all the world. Possessed of a common language, unequalled even by the Greek, and understood in all parts of the earth, our thoughts have been quickened by apt words of expression. Protected by our laws, we have had the incentive of effort, knowing that we and our children would enjoy the wages of our labor. Freed of governmental paternalism, we developed initiative and have acquired both individual and national prosperity. With our laws we inherited a great religion, and humble ourselves not before men or idols but before the true and living God. We have led mankind in the inventions of genius and have greatly increased the comfort and the productive capacity of the world. We have verified the vision of Milton of 'a mighty and puissant people,' rousing itself, as a strong man after sleep, as a young eagle mewing his immortal wing and lighting his undazzled eye in the full noonday sun.

"Certain cardinal principles of government have characterized our growth as a Nation. One of these, which distinguishes us from all other people, is the abolishment of privilege. Our law recognizes no class, and our Constitution guarantees to every citizen the 'equal protection of the law.' And we have enthroned in the center of the temple of our State and have guarded it as more precious than life itself that principle which we celebrate to-day—the sovereignty and complete independence of the United States. And yet this Fourth of July, as we are gathered here to celebrate the declaration of our independence from Europe, is the first in 143 years when, instead of giving ourselves over wholly to gratitude for our liberties, we actually find our people engaged in a discussion whether we will unite again our fortunes with Europe, from which we were freed in blood and tears. True it is, as the President said at Suresnes on Memorial Day, that our people 'do not realize what has happened.' For the first time, as we meet to celebrate our independence, we find ourselves confronted by the demand that we must make the supreme sacrifice of joining our fortunes with the fortunes of men everywhere. Glorying to-day in that advantage which has been earned by the toil and heroism of our people and preserved by the wisdom of our statesmen, we are told on high authority that the day of national advantage has come to an end. The independence of America and the greatness it has achieved has been the greatest blessing that has ever come to the world; and yet we are told that in the interest of humanity we must sacrifice this fortress of freedom. The most potent factor in preserving the peace of the word has been the power and independence of the United States, and yet we are told in the name of peace we must submerge our independence into a greater United States of the World. The immemorial policy of our statesmen, from Washington to Roosevelt, has been 'peace and honest friendship with all nations'; and yet we are told that 'we are ashamed of our past and ready to forget it.'

"I see before me the returned heroes of this war. I am not ashamed of the record they have made. It is a record of imperishable glory. I have seen a people, lulled into a false security, in a state of unpreparedness, for two years after the sinking of the Lusitania, finally led into war, to give belated redress to the wrongs which had been done them, astonish the world by the unity of their patriotism. I am not ashamed of their sacrifices and devotion. They avenged the wrongs of our citizens and restored the essential rights of the Nation on land and sea. Their devotion is not to be forgotten, but preserved in holy memory forever. Nor are we ashamed of our fathers nor of the 'old order.'

"We are told that to secure the cooperation of nations to preserve peace we must establish a league of nations and put under its control the 'major forces of mankind.' On the contrary, we have on all occasions cooperated with other nations to preserve peace, without surrendering our independence to a league of nations. The most recent instance of this was our cooperation with other nations to enforce peace against Germany. We did this effectively, without a league of nations. In fact, should the power to enforce peace be surrendered to a league of nations, with its own distinct government, there could be no such thing as the free cooperation of nations to enforce peace, since the nations would have divested themselves of this power and conferred it upon the league of nations, which alone would have the power to act.

"The Monroe doctrine, the unwritten law of our foreign policy, was the declaration of the determination of the United States to cooperate with all the nations of the Western Hemisphere to preserve them in peace against the assaults of Europe. This essential principle has done more to preserve peace for a hundred years than all the leagues of nations ever formed. It is proposed now to abandon it in the name of the very peace which it has preserved, and to give to a league of nations, dominated by Europe, complete jurisdiction over every international dispute in which America may be involved.

"It is said Germany would not have commenced the war if she had known the United States would join the forces against her. All that was necessary to make this known to her was for the United States to have announced it. Rev. Henry Van Dyke brought to this Government an appeal from France and England to join them in curbing Germany. The appeal was rejected. It could have been accepted without a league of nations. We finally did join the Allies against Germany without a league of nations.

"It is said that a league is necessary to enforce peace. Peace was enforced against Germany without the league, and such a military power as Germany possessed will not menace the world again in 50 years.

"It is said the league will bring peace to the world. The nations are now cooperating together in Paris. They have not brought peace to the world. War is going on in 20 places in the world—in Russia, in Siberia, in Jugo-Slavonia, in Hungary, in Poland, in Turkey, in Mexico, in Haiti, in Germany. What will the league of nations do to enforce peace in these countries that the military powers now sitting in a peace congress can not do, or refuse to do? If we desire to enforce peace, can not we enforce peace in Costa Rica, or Haiti, or Mexico, without the assistance of a league of nations?

"It is said all future wars can be prevented by a league of nations. If that is so, why did not the great league of nations of 1839 for the neutrality of Belgium prevent the invasion of Belgium by one of the members of the league? Will the new league be any less a 'scrap of paper' than the old one?

"It is said a league of nations is necessary for a limitation of armaments. If this is so, how was disarmament effected on the Canadian border without a league of nations? If disarmament could be effected on the Canadian border without a league, why can not it be done elsewhere? The truth is disarmament can not be ordered by a league of nations but can only be brought about, if at all, by conference and free action and agreement among the nations.

"The league to enforce peace provides neither for peace nor for disarmament.

"It is said that as litigants submit to the decree of a court, nations ought to submit to the decrees of a league of nations. This is an admission that the independence and sovereignty of the Nation is to be surrendered. The court represents the sovereign power of government and disposes of the lives, liberties, and property of parties, and force is back of its decrees; otherwise they would be worthless. We submit to it because it is our own Government, under our control. If a league dominated by foreign powers is to have such control over the United States, then the liberty we are celebrating to-day will be at an end.

"But it is said that other nations surrender as much as we do. This is not true; but, even if it were true, it would be but poor consolation for the loss of our independence to know that other nations had lost theirs. The Kaiser and his socialist followers undertook to set up a power that would have internationalized the world, just as is proposed by the Bolsheviki and the Industrial Workers of the World, who propose to set up an international government to enforce peace under the 'dictatorship of the proletariat.' If they succeed, all nations will have given up the same liberties, and, as all would be on the same footing, according to the league argument, none should object. But such an equality of dishonor would be but a poor compensation for the loss of freedom.

"Peace has been earned by victory and will be preserved by the continued cooperation of the free nations of the world and not by the surrender of their independence to a league.

"There is another menace to our liberties in the propaganda of Bolshevism. Bolshevism is the doctrine of communism to be brought about by force. It is a revolutionary movement, with the object of the forcible seizure and confiscation of all property and its distribution among the revolutionists. This movement is based upon the doctrine of class rule. It would put the Government in the hands of one class and proscribe and exterminate by fire, blood, and starvation all other classes. Its rule would be based on despotism, denying liberty of speech and of the press, and basing its power solely on the doctrine of force. It is put forward in the name of labor, but in fact would be utterly destructive of labor. The only protection of the laboring man is the law. Bolshevism would destroy the law. The only incentive to labor is the vested right of the laborer in his wages. Bolshevism denies the principle of property, without which the fruits of industry would be impossible. Bolshevism would destroy industry and there would be no labor. The end would be the destruction of civilization and a reversion to barbarism, if not the extermination of the race.

"Printing presses are being operated and tons of literature are being distributed advocating this anarchy. Most of its advocates are foreigners. Every alien Bolshevist should be deported at once.

"Both the league of nations and the revolutionary movement of Bolshevism are being supported by vast sums of money and have the encouragement of persons in official position. International big business is backing the league of nations and the international pacifists are supporting both the league of nations and Bolshevism.

"Prussianism, with its socialist backing, league of nationsism, and Bolshevism have this in common. Each proposes to secure peace throughout the world by a central force to enforce peace. Each proposes a central world government. Each is based on internationalism as opposed to the doctrine of nationality. Each alike would mean perpetual war or the sinking of civilization into a despotism that would be worse than death.

"As an illustration of the disappointments and the cruel despotism of the league of nations, it is said the Koreans believed President Wilson would appear in an aeroplane and set them free from Japan. Hopeless insurrection and many deaths resulted, while in the meantime the league of nations was busily engaged in making a compact with Japan whereby instead of freeing the Koreans 30,000,000 Chinese were transferred to her control.

"The land is full of Tories, as in 1776, and it is time for every patriot to be on guard."

[In an address before the Fifteenth District Republican Club, New York, June 24, 1919, on the future of the Republican Party, Senator POINDEXTER said, in part:]

"The mission of the Republican Party in the immediate future is to save the Republic from the process of national disintegration in progress during the present administration. The administration has abandoned our citizens in Mexico to murder and robbery. The Republican Party should elect a President who will fulfill the responsibilities we have assumed in Mexico and reassert American honor and self-respect, so that our citizens, lawfully in that country, will not be forced to ransom their lives with money. After six years of Democratic vacillation and weakness in dealing with Mexico, the suggestion now made in some quarters that Great Britain should be invited to restore order in Mexico should be denounced as false to our fundamental policies, and a Republican Congress should restore order in Mexico and adjust on correct principles its international obligations.

"The act of the Democratic Congress and President internationalizing the Panama Canal should be repealed and that waterway restored again as the property of the people of the United States, to be used in such a way as will be of greatest possible benefit to them, with foreign nations on the same footing among themselves, as provided by treaty.

"The promise of the Democratic administration to haul down the American flag in the Philippine Islands should be repudiated, and a Republican President and Congress should make it clear that the blessings of liberty, which the people of those islands have enjoyed under American rule, will be preserved and the mutual advantage of trade and industrial development under the protection of American law retained for our people. The proposal, while abandoning our responsibilities in the Philippines to assume the government of Constantinople and Armenia, should be repudiated.

"The extraordinary powers vested in the Executive during the emergency of the war should be repealed at once and Government should be restored to a normal basis.

"The direct and oppressive extraordinary taxes, retarding business and increasing the high cost of living, should be reduced and repealed as rapidly as possible. In order to do this the expenditures of the Government should be restored to a normal basis, waste and inefficiency eliminated, war bureaus abolished, and a tariff bill, so framed as to obtain a larger share of revenue from import duties to protect industry, maintain wages, and especially to protect and encourage the new industries established during the war, should be enacted without delay.

"It should be the first care of a Republican administration to stamp out of the country the propaganda of anarchy and revolution. The alien advocates of enforced communism and confiscation should be returned at once and without exception to the country whence they came, and their aiders and abetters in this country, the so-called 'parlor Bolshevists,' who contribute money to the revolutionary cause, and the officials of the Government, of high and low degree, who have encouraged Bolshevist activities should be exposed and punished.

"The new doctrine of internationalism, advocated alike by the Kaiser and his socialist followers, and by the anarchists and Bolshevists of Russia and America, should be combated as fatal to our institutions. The effort of the internationalists to 'join our fortunes with the fortunes of men everywhere,' and to form a United States of the World, should be opposed as wholly inconsistent with American independence and a menace to liberty."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I can not vote for the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany in its present form, and it is because, after as careful and candid a consideration as I have been able to give to the subject, I am inevitably led to this conclusion that I am to-day asking the attention of the Senate while I point out, as briefly as I can, some of the reasons why it seems to me the treaty should be amended. I shall to-day confine my remarks almost entirely to one of its provisions. I do not want to be understood by this that there are not other amendments that in my judgment should be made, but the one provision that I shall confine my remarks to is so indefensible, so unjust, and so wicked that it alone would in my judgment be sufficient to reject the treaty even though every other word contained in it were entirely satisfactory.

Before I take up this particular article, I desire to say that during all my public life I have been a firm believer in some kind of an international agreement between the leading civilized nations of the world that would make war between civilized nations as nearly impossible as human ingenuity could devise. Every drop of my blood cries out aloud in sympathy with what I believe to be the human heartbeats all over the civilized world, that out of this terrible strife, turmoil, blood, and suffering should come some such an agreement. It is a sad commentary upon the civilization of the present age that the great nations of the world, while compelling their citizens to submit their quarrels and disputes to courts and tribunals, organized under general laws for that purpose, should themselves violate the principle of the very law which they enforce upon their subjects. The same principle of law and equity that settles an ordinary lawsuit before a justice of the peace will, if properly applied, without any change or addition, settle every dispute that can possibly arise between nations. War is a relic of barbarism, and can be defended upon no principle that holds sway and controls in any civilized Government. A torn, suffering, bleeding world is heartsick of the barbarous thing that civilization calls war. In the establishment of machinery for the settlement of international disputes in courts of reason rather than upon the battle field no new principle is involved. It only requires the application of those well-understood principles of justice that now apply in all civilized communities. The present treaty which contains the so-called league of nations is not founded upon any such principle. It contains within itself, as I shall later point out, the germs of wickedness and injustice that violate at the beginning the very principle that must control if we are to have a permanent peace. It lays the foundation for future war just as surely and certainly as the stealing of Alsace and Lorraine by Germany 50 years ago kept burning in the heart of every Frenchman a hope for the day when by whatever means necessary they might overthrow the rule of a foreign monarch and ally themselves again with the people of their own tongue.

The league of nations is only a part of the treaty. It contains in itself many objectionable features, but even if we were willing to accept it in its present form we could not do so without accepting the entire treaty. I know that there is a serious objection against any amendment to any part of the treaty, because such a course means that the entire treaty must go back for consideration to the representatives of the various nations. But if the treaty must go back for revision it may just as well go back for a dozen amendments as for one, and since I can not vote for the ratification of the treaty unamended I shall therefore avail myself of every opportunity to vote for any amendment that, in my judgment, improves it, whether it be that part of the treaty providing for a league of nations or any other part. The league of nations part of the treaty was given to the world before the balance of the treaty was drafted, and since that is the part in which the people of civilization were the most interested they have not given attention to many of the other things that the treaty contains, and there are millions of people now who do not know that in order to obtain the league as provided for in the treaty we must agree to many other stipulations and agreements that are abhorrent to every man's sense of equity and justice.

I desire, Mr. President, to be constructive in my criticism. I do not want to tear down an edifice without suggesting, at least, something to take its place, for the object to be accomplished is well worthy of the consideration at hand. I desire, therefore, before I take up the criticism of the treaty which I intend to make, to briefly outline what I believe ought to be included in a treaty providing for a league of nations which, under existing conditions of civilization, we can have a reasonable expectation would receive the approval of mankind. In trying to reach an agreement we ought to approach the subject with an open mind. We ought to free ourselves, as far as possible, of all prejudice and feeling of self-glorification. This applies both to the individual and to the Nation. We should realize that no agreement on any great question in the history of the world has ever been reached except on the basis of sacrifice and compromise. We ought always to keep in mind that the one object in view is the abolishment of war. If we look over the history of the world and observe the paramount causes of wars in the past, it will not be very difficult to discover the things that must be accomplished in order that war may be avoided in the future.

DISARMAMENT.

Standing out prominently among the things that have caused war in the past is the question of armament. Without armament built up in times of peace, the danger of war would not only be lessened but to a great extent abolished entirely. If armament is dangerous to the peace of the world, then why not abolish it? This course, however, requires concert of action. So long as one great nation is building immense fleets of battleships and dreadnoughts, every other nation is compelled to keep somewhere in the same class; and thus we soon have a race between the leading nations of the world to see which can build the greatest fleet of these weapons of human destruction. It is a historical fact that no nation that has kept on increasing its army and developing its navy has not finally found an excuse to use them in battle. I am not intending to discuss this particular subject in detail at the present time, but I only want to say in passing that the present war would have been avoided had Germany not been arming herself and preparing for it for the last 40 years. Article 8 of the pending treaty specifically recognizes the principle that peace can not be maintained without disarmament, but, in my judgment, there is no provision in the treaty anywhere that will bring about disarmament. If the nations which drew it were in earnest and meant to disarm, it would have been just as easy to disarm themselves by this treaty as it was to disarm Germany.

CONQUEST.

Another historical guidepost that leads to war is the conquest of one nation by another—the transferring of the people of a nation at the cannon's mouth, as though they were slaves and chattels. In the present state of human society it is universally condemned by all civilized people. The abolishment of conquest would go a long way toward establishing a permanent peace. It is not defended by any people or nation, and the constitution of a league of nations should contain an agreement that no nation would under any circumstances engage in conquest or add to its territory in any way except by the consent of the people transferred. The compact should go a little further, and provide that no nation would ever recognize the transfer of a people from one nationality to another without their consent.

SECRET TREATIES AND SECRET DIPLOMACY.

The compact for a league of nations should require that all international business should be done in public. Legislatures and parliaments transact their business in the open, where the common citizen can look on and study every step of legislative progress. The laws that govern the people and which the people must obey must be enacted in public and enforced in public, and yet the same nations that follow this wholesome rule in their internal affairs violate it entirely when they are negotiating with other nations. The light of publicity is one of the greatest specifics for governmental ills, and its helpful influence applies with equal force to international matters. Secret diplomacy and secret treaties are admitted everywhere to be among the greatest evils of the world. Treaties become the supreme law of every land, and yet many of them have been enacted and held in secret during all the centuries that have passed. They have been the direct cause of many wars and have had important influence in bringing on many other wars. No voice in all Christendom is to-day defending them. Then why not abolish them by international agreement?

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

The compact for a league of nations should also contain a provision for the arbitration of international disputes. The militarist goes on the theory that might makes right, and yet everybody knows that it is not only a false theory but it is an uncivilized and a barbarous proposition. What assurance can any nation have that a question settled on the field of battle by contending armies will be settled right? Not only does the settlement involve untold misery and suffering by millions of people, but when the decision is reached there is no assurance whatever that it will be either fair or just.

These propositions look simple. They are all practically self-evident. And yet, if they were established by an agreement among the leading nations, the permanent peace of the world would be practically assured. All the wars of the past between nations have been due to one or more of these causes. Personally I would be willing to include some other things in the league. I would not reject a league because it did not contain all of these, but we must take the world as it is and not as we wish it. If the establishment of these four propositions that I have named will bring about a permanent peace, then why not confine our energies, at least for the present, to their establishment. To include more is to invite opposition that may endanger the success of the entire undertaking.

Disarmament is recognized as necessary for permanent peace. Conquest is known to be wrong both in principle and in practice. Secret treaties and secret diplomacy create international suspicion, jealousy, and injustice; and arbitration of disputes between nations is only following out the principle of justice that is applied to the individual all over the civilized world.

The constitution for a league of nations ought not to include anything that is not absolutely necessary to carry out the object of the compact. The few things which I have enumerated are recognized to be the principal causes of all the wars of history. It might safely be said that every war of the past between established civilized nations would have been avoided had these enumerated propositions been recognized and observed.

AN INTERNATIONAL ARMY AND NAVY.

I do not believe it is practical or possible or even desirable that there should be established by any compact an international army or international navy. Human nature will have to change before it is possible for an army of one nationality to be used and handled at will by the government of another nation. For the same reason the so-called international police force will be a practical impossibility. Moreover, there is no necessity for any international force of this kind. If the world would abolish secret diplomacy and secret treaties and conquest and would disarm, there would be nothing for an international army or navy to do, even if it were practicable or possible to have an agreement that would provide for it. There have been many instances in the past where great powers have submitted great questions to international arbitration, and yet there is not an instance in history where any civilized nation failed to carry out in good faith the judgment of such a court. It is hardly conceivable that a civilized nation would take such a course. Such a nation would at once become an outcast in civilization, and if disarmed she would be harmless and sooner or later compelled to submit to the judgment of the arbitration tribunal. And if the international agreement provided for an economic boycott of such a nation, it could not long exist without compliance with the judgment.

SOVEREIGNTY.

I have no sympathy with the argument that by entering a league of nations such as I have outlined we would thereby surrender our sovereignty. Complete liberty of action would, of course, be modified and circumscribed by the constitution of the league; but this is true of every agreement in civilization, whether individual, state, or national. Absolute freedom in any civilized society can not be had, and the assertion and attempt to practice such a freedom is anarchy. The only man who has complete personal liberty is the barbarian living entirely alone in the woods. Every law enacted by every legislature in Christendom circumscribes freedom of action. Human society is built upon the principle that we must surrender some of our individual freedom for the benefit of the whole. This is true of every individual contract. It is true of the most sacred contract known to man—the marriage relation. The 13 sovereign States had to surrender some of their sovereignty when they formed the Union. Our Government never entered into a treaty with any nation on earth without surrendering to the extent of the terms of the treaty some of our sovereignty. And here again we are met with the same proposition that I have before asserted—that in the formation of the proper kind of a league of nations there is no new principle involved. It is only the application of well-recognized principles to international relations.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

I do not agree with a large number of my colleagues in regard to the desirabilities of excepting the Monroe doctrine from the application of a league of nations. If we get the right kind of a league of nations, we thereby abandon the Monroe doctrine, and we ought to be glad to do it. We get something better for it. If conquest is abolished, if disarmament takes place, and secret treaties are no longer made, there is no further excuse for the existence of the Monroe doctrine. It never would have been promulgated had there been no secret agreements, secret treaties, or standing armies. The object of the Monroe doctrine was to prohibit conquest upon the Western Hemisphere by nations of the Eastern Hemisphere. If conquest is abolished, then the Monroe doctrine falls. It is replaced with something that applies to the whole world rather than to only a part.

ENTANGLING ALLIANCES.

It is claimed by some that the entering into any kind of a league of nations involves us in entangling alliances, particularly with Europe. I am as anxious as anyone to keep my country out of entangling alliances, and I am in favor of a league of nations such as I have outlined, because I believe it will keep us out of entangling alliances. We are in entangling alliances now. Under the old system we have been unable to avoid them, and it is sufficient answer to this criticism, it seems to me, that our Army is at this very moment standing guard along the Rhine. The world is much smaller than it used to be. The invention of steam, the telegraph, telephone, flying machine, and electrical appliances, have brought the nations of the earth much nearer together. Whether we wish it or not, we are next door neighbor to every nation on earth. We can not avoid international contact, even if we desired to do so, and one of the principal objects of the league of nations would be to prevent entanglements and thus save not only our Nation but all the nations of the earth from getting into them.

PRESENT TREATY.

I have thus briefly outlined what in my judgment ought to be included in a league of nations. I know that no man can get just what he wants, and I would be willing to take less or accept more, so long as the bounds of reason were not surpassed. Moreover, I would be willing to resolve every doubt in favor of the approval of any treaty providing for a league; but we have before us a treaty containing not only a provision for a league of nations, but a re-marking of many of the international lines of the world. And we are asked to accept it in its entirety, without change or modification. It transfers from one nationality to another hundreds of thousands of people. It remaps the entire world. It contains many things outside of the provisions for the league itself that shocks the sensibilities of justice and right. Among these, standing out prominently, is the transfer of a great portion of the Chinese Empire to Japan.

Section 156 of the treaty provides that all the rights, privileges, and possessions of Germany in China shall be turned over to Japan. The practical effect of this provision is to give Japan control over the Chinese Nation and to turn over to her the control of more than thirty-six millions of the Chinese population. Japan is given railroads, mines, submarine cables, together with the right and privilege of exploiting, all free, without compensation, and without limit. There is not a word anywhere in the treaty of Japan, under any circumstances, ever being required to turn anything back to China. It must be remembered that Germany had no right in China that any honest man was bound to respect. What rights she obtained there she obtained at the cannon's mouth because China was unable to defend herself.

It must be remembered, too, that China was one of our allies in the war against Germany. She rendered valuable assistance and sent 300,000 of her people to France, where they were engaged in the necessary work of constructing fortifications, and so forth. She turned over to the allied nations a large number of German ships that had been interned in her waters. The men China sent to Europe, while not equipped with guns and armament, were sent into the most dangerous zones. They worked under the direct fire of German guns, and when the correct statistics are obtained there is no doubt whatever in my mind but what the figures will show that China lost more men in killed and wounded on the field of battle in this war than did Japan. China not only furnished many German ships and hundreds of thousands of men for the allied cause, but she contributed in a liberal way from her meager savings to the various other war activities. When in America we were making the famous united war-work drive for funds, to be contributed for the work of the Y. M. C. A., the Red Cross, and the Salvation Army, China was asked to contribute $100,000. In answer to this call made by America, in a drive in China lasting two weeks, she contributed $1,300,000, and, as showing the class of contributors to this fund, it is interesting to note that in one Chinese city alone there was contributed 240,000 pennies.

She did everything that an unarmed nation like her could possibly do in carrying on the struggle. She demanded no indemnity, no pay; but at the peace council she asked that the property stolen from her by Germany should be returned to its rightful owner. No nation had a representative at that peace council with cleaner hands than did China. Practically all the other great nations, except ours, were asking for indemnity or the transfer of sovereignty from some other nation. Of all the allied nations against Germany, Japan was perhaps the only one that made any financial gain out of the war. She had no right to the Shantung Peninsula of China than would America have had to demand that Alsace and Lorraine be transferred to her. It is no argument to say that Japan drove Germany out of China. It would be just as logical to say that America drove Germany out of France; that American soldiers recaptured portions of Alsace and Lorraine, and that therefore these territories should be turned over to American sovereignty. Germany had no legal title to a foot of land in China. This is conceded by everybody. No one has yet defended her course. In the case of Alsace and Lorraine, it might even be said in favor of the German Government that these Provinces were transferred to Germany 50 years ago at the end of a bitter war, and that they were part of the indemnity that the victor had a right to demand of the vanquished. But even this argument, unreasonable as it is, can not be offered in favor of giving Shantung and other portions of China to Japan. When Germany took this property from China there had been in reality no contest between the nations, but, like a highway robber, she stole into the harbors with her ships and compelled the Chinese Government to submit.

Every voice in Christendom cried out aloud that France, in the settlement of this war, should be entitled to the return of Alsace and Lorraine. For the same reason and by the same logic civilization ought to have demanded that the property which Germany stole from China should be returned to China. Moreover, when Germany compelled China to surrender portions of her territory it was stipulated in the treaty that was then forced upon China that under no circumstances should Germany be allowed to transfer any of this property to any other nation without China's consent; so if we want to be so cruel and unreasonable as to recognize Germany's title we must take it as a whole, and if we do, then the peace conference had no authority, either in justice or in law, even under their own interpretation, to violate the provisions that required China's consent to any transfer of these concessions to any other power. This action of the peace conference violates every principle of honesty and justice. It is a betrayal by the allied nations of a friendly nation. It turns over innocent millions of people to the rule and control of their worst enemy. Anyone believing in the principle of self-determination of people must blush with shame at this outrageous procedure. China is helpless, it is true. She can not defend herself. She ought to be protected by her friends, but it seems that she was at the mercy of her enemies and they failed and refused to extend to her the mercy that every victorious soldier ought to be willing to extend even to an enemy. She was betrayed by her own friends, and her people have been denied the right to govern themselves and the nation left in the control of the last nation on earth that China would have selected to control her had she been given a voice in the decision of her own destiny. And all this done by those whom she trusted, those in whom she confided and placed her trust, those for whom she shed her blood and sacrificed the lives of many of her people, her comrades in arms in a common cause. One of the most pitiable spectacles in the history of the world is the picture of poor, weak, downtrodden China pleading before the great world tribunal for justice—yes, for mercy—pleading to be saved the humiliation of turning over 36,000,000 of her people, her industries, her holy land, the sacred dust of her ancestors, to the control and government of the one nation of all the earth she feared the most. China had reason for fear. She had been cruelly punished by Japan before. She had been treated by Japan the same as she had been treated by Germany. She had at her own door an illustration of what could be expected when the Japanese were given power to rule over a foreign people. She had seen Japan cruelly and unmercifully take possession of her neighbor, Korea. She knew that at this very time Japan was doing everything within her power to blot out every vestige of Korean literature and history. She knew that Japanese soldiers and Japanese officers had cruelly murdered innocent Koreans who were guilty of only one crime—that of loving their country. She knew that women and children had been murdered in cold blood. She knew that every Korean official had been forced out of office, and that from bottom to top the Korean Government was ruled by the Japanese. She knew that private residences all over Korea were searched for books and literature, and wherever such things were found they were burned, in order that the rising generation might have no opportunity to learn the history of their own country. She knew that the Korean language was being supplanted by the Japanese language, and no place in all the Empire was a Korean school permitted to exist. As between German rule in China and the Japanese rule that she had a right to expect she would have no hesitancy in welcoming back the Hohenzollern. As between German rule in China and Japanese rule in Korea she knew that even the Kaiser's control, wrong and unjust as it was, was a bright and shining light compared with what she could reasonably expect from Japan.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a photograph of a dead Korean citizen. This was given me by Mr. S. A. Beck, who for 20 years has been a missionary or an agent of the American Bible Society in Korea. He returned to this country only last month, and he stood at the elbow of the man who snapped the kodak when this picture was taken. This poor Korean has one ear cut off. His face is smashed almost into a jelly. He has 28 wounds on his body, every wound given by a Japanese official or soldier; and of what was he guilty? What was the charge? He was unarmed, innocent, engaged in no attempt to do anything unlawful; but in the exuberance of his patriotism he had been guilty of crying aloud, "Hurrah for Korea," and for that he was run down, mutilated, punished, and finally killed. It is only one instance of what is almost a common occurrence in Korea.

I have here a copy of the report made by the Presbyterian Church of America on conditions in Korea, printed in the New York Times of July 13. I shall not attempt to read this entire report, but I wish that every citizen of the United States, and particularly every Senator who must soon pass upon the proposition whether he will turn China over to these same people, would read it. I wish every member of that church all over our land might read this official report by the missionaries of that church. In their introductory they say:

> Many of these reports are repulsive in the extreme, and our readers' blood will boil with indignation, as ours has who have witnessed these things. We make very few comments, therefore, and leave the facts to convey their own lesson. Were the conditions as they actually are to be fully reported, the report would be extremely long and too horrible to relate.

They go on to tell of the tortures—the means that are used—not against people who are committing crimes, not against men who have been adjudged guilty of any charge or any offense, but men and women who have dared to say that they loved their country. Many of these punishments are inflicted for the purpose of extracting confessions for the purpose of getting evidence from the men persecuted against missionaries in order to drive the Christian missionaries out of Korea.

They hang men up by their fingers until the joints separate. They brand the flesh with red-hot irons. They have all manner of means to torture. In many cases it is for the purpose of securing statements from the victims implicating Christian missionaries, and, of course, it is only a question of time until any confession desired is extracted from the unfortunate victims.

This Mr. Beck, who is a Methodist minister, told me he had seen hundreds of Koreans—men, women, and children—run down by officers on horseback, clubbed by Japanese policemen, beaten by soldiers, pounded into insensibility, stabbed with bayonets, and cut up with swords, all because the innocent people joined in a parade in honor of their own country. They were unarmed, harmless, and not even charged with any crime or misdemeanor.

I have had this same man, who spent 20 years in Korea, describe to me things that he saw with his own eyes on the public streets that are so horrible that it does not seem possible that anyone can believe them,

Now, this Presbyterian official report goes on. I want to quote a little from it. In these punishments that are inflicted they eventually get any kind of testimony they want. Everybody knows that if you commence to torture a human being you can eventually get anything from him that you desire, and they keep on with the torturing until they get it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is the Senator going to incorporate that report in his remarks?

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to doing so.

Mr. McCORMICK. I hope it will be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Here is one instance where they tortured a man, giving an instance of it. This Presbyterian missionary report says, speaking of a man who had been mutilated and whom the narrator saw 33 days after it occurred, when he was in the hospital still alive, with his entire body sore, all battered nearly to pieces, and, as he said, it was almost a revelation that he was still alive:

I saw one scar on the upper part of the leg. It had been seared, some 5 inches in length by a red-hot iron. Of these he bears four—

And so on.

Speaking of another case, they use this language:

This case is not an isolated one. Scores, hundreds, of similar cases could be cited and fully substantiated. Every police station is a veritable hell on earth. Every human refinement in brutality is known there, and such brutality is perpetrated as would blister the tongue to utter.

Another quotation:

Occasionally instead of imprisoning the men they are let off with only 90 blows of the bamboo rod, and that this is no light matter you may well imagine. No man could endure it all at once, so the 90 blows are administered 30 per day for three successive days. A large number of cases coming to the private hospitals are of men who have been thus beaten until they are nearly done for.

Now, I want to read from another part of this same report, and I wish the Senate would listen. You who have daughters and admire them, you who have wives and love them, you who have mothers and revere them, listen:

The examination of women who have been arrested for activity in the independence movement is the most disgraceful and humiliating possible. It will have to be remembered, however, that the Japanese feel no shame when nude in the presence of the other sex. On the other hand, the Korean and the Chinese women have the same feeling of delicacy as Europeans. They feel intense shame when seen by another. The Japanese know this, and so when they put Korean women into the question box—this, mind you, is before they are condemned at all—they are stripped absolutely naked. They are stripped not after they go to the room where they are questioned but in their rooms of confinement, and that by gendarmes.

From here they have to walk across an open court, where they can be seen by anyone who pleases.

Some women who tried to cover themselves had their hands tied behind them. One Bible woman had her arm wrenched out of its socket by this process.

Mr. President, as I said awhile ago, they are particularly anxious to drive Christianity out of the land. I have had explained to me by this missionary from Korea how in a village near Seoul the Christian men were all commanded by the soldiers to go into their own church, and when they got in the soldiers commenced to fire upon the church. Anyone coming out was killed. Then they set fire to the church and burned it and all the men in it. This Presbyterian report refers to an instance of that kind. The missionary had a conversation with a Korean that I want to read. The missionary says:

What is that smoke? Korean.—That is a village that has been burned. Missionary.—When was it burned? Korean.—Yesterday. Missionary.—How was it burned? Korean (glancing around fearfully).—By the soldiers. Missionary.—Why? Did the people riot or shout for independence? Korean.—No; but that is a Christian village.

He goes on with this same Korean and discovers that he lived in the village, and asked him how it happened he is still alive, and the answer was:

I am not a Christian. Only the Christians were ordered to gather.

Mr. President, I wish the Christian people of America would note that all the sacrifices which they have made in Korea now if this treaty goes through, all that they have made in China, or every missionary that has gone there to set up a church and preach the doctrine of Christianity, the doctrine of the lowly Nazarene, are all in jeopardy.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. In this connection it is worthy of recollection that 1 of the 24 demands made upon China by Japan in 1915 was that Buddhism should be taught in China without restriction or limitation.

Mr. NORRIS. They will do in China like they are doing in Korea. Every book in Korea, every magazine, every paper, every history is being destroyed. The soldiers search the private rooms of the people to get them, in order that they may blot off the face of the earth every vestige of Korean history, which every student knows goes back many centuries, long before the Christian era. These men are just as proud of their country as we are of ours.

But it is going further even than that. These missionaries say that the one particular thing that the soldiers and the police are always trying to find out, whenever they resort to all manner of torture, is in order to get evidence against the missionaries. These are the questions that they put to them. If they raise the flag of Korea, they try to get them to admit when they are dying with torture that some missionary prompted them to do it. It is the Christian religion that is going to be blotted off the face of the earth over there. They then resort to various schemes, charging that the Christians have done the damage and committed the depredations. I will just read a little in this Presbyterian report on that score. This is taken from the pastor of the church at Tyungju:

On April 8 the gendarmes came to the newly built church in this city and gathered the furniture and mats together and set fire to them. Then they put out the fire. The next night a large pile of combustible material was heaped upon the pulpit and set on fire.

They could prove that these soldiers put out one fire. They were careful not to prove that they set the fire which they put out. The next night another fire was started. A deacon of the church rang the bell, and a few Christians came together and put out the fire. The next morning the police commanded the Christians who had houses near the church to move away, the pretext being that they had set fire to the church. Then they moved away, and after they were gone, on the next day, combustibles were put about the church soaked with coal oil and then set on fire. Then the soldiers rang the bell, but nobody came. There was not anybody left to come, and the church and everything burned up. I presume that the records of the Japanese soldier show that the Christians set fire to their own church, and that the first two times the soldiers put out the fire, but that they were unable to do so the third time.

And all this we are asked to approve by a ratification of this treaty. We are now expected to add to this international crime by giving senatorial approval to this unjust judgment. I am as anxious as any man on earth to bring about a fair and honorable league of nations; but if you permitted me to write the constitution of the league and make of it what in my judgment would be a model, and coupled with it the approval of this rape upon China, I would decline. We can not build a temple of justice upon a foundation of sand. We can not build an international tribunal founded upon the betrayal of any people, however weak. Sooner or later such a structure must crumble and decay. Every guidepost of history points to the futility of such attempts made by man. A century ago the avaricious kings of Europe divided up Poland. And yet the spirit of Poland lives; and even now, at the close of this great world struggle, the voice of humanity cries aloud that Poland shall be resurrected. Fifty years ago Germany wrung from France, after a bitter contest, the beautiful Provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. The world stood by. It realized that an injustice was being done, but no nation felt warranted in interfering; but when the world struggle came, when this great war began, there came from all over the world the universal cry that Alsace and Lorraine should be restored to France. These lessons of history teach us that we can not violate the laws of God or nature without eventually suffering the penalty. And whatever structure we build, however powerful we may be when we build it, founded upon such an outrageous and unjust judgment, it will, in God's own time, bring about its own destruction. We are only planting the seeds of future wars that will be just as certain to come as the universal law of creation remains intact.

THE PROCEDURE AT THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

As indefensible as is the judgment rendered at the peace council in transferring Chinese property and sovereignty to Japan, the procedure by which this unjust judgment was brought about is still more reprehensible and indefensible. It is difficult for a fair and reasonable mind to comprehend how these great powers could treat an allied nation with such unmerciful cruelty and lack of justice. But this judgment can be understood better when we observe the procedure by which it was brought about. As unjust and as bad as the judgment was, it fades into insignificance when compared with the secret agreement by which these great powers agreed to divide up the spoils of victory and turn China, one of their own friends and allies, without her consent and against her objection, over to her ancient enemy.

When it became apparent that the United States was about to enter the war, it was feared that China would follow her.

In fact, there is but little doubt but that China would have gone into the war long before she did had it not been for the influence of Japan in keeping her out. England, France, Russia, and Italy all wanted China to get in, and while the matter is shrouded somewhat in mystery there can be but little doubt to the unprejudiced mind that it was Japan, working through her allies, that prevented China from declaring war against Germany. Her object in this was obvious. If China joined in the fight against Germany, she would have a right to appear at the peace conference and to have her wishes and her rights taken into consideration in agreeing upon the terms of peace. Obviously Japan preferred that China should have no place at the peace table, but Great Britain and France were anxious to have China join the allies in order to get the German ships that were interned in Chinese waters. Everybody knows that the question of transportation was one of the vital things of the war. The destruction of ships by submarines had made it necessary for every allied nation to bend every energy in the building of ships in order to replace those that were lost. It was the one thing that for a time appeared to be the greatest cause for fear that Germany might win, and therefore the question of securing these German ships was exceedingly important and valuable. An unbiased mind might even question whether Japan was acting in good faith in thus interfering with the acquiring of ships that might spell the difference between victory and defeat. It seems almost incredible that at this critical stage any allied nation, anxious for the allied cause to win, should take any steps, especially of a selfish nature, to prevent the acquiring of additional ships; but when it became apparent that America was going into the war, and Japan, realizing that this would probably also bring China in, she systematically took up the question with the great powers. She entered into a secret agreement with her then allies—England, France, Italy, and Russia—which provided that after China had become a belligerent, and had given her blood and treasure to bring victory, when these allied powers met around the council table they would divide the spoils of victory among themselves and rob China of her birthright by turning her over to the tender mercies of Japan.

On the 27th day of March, 1917, the Japanese minister of foreign affairs at Tokyo approached the British ambassador located at that place with a view of bringing about such an agreement with the British Government. The British minister cabled to his government at London, and after receiving instructions from his government wrote the Japanese Government as follows:

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Tokyo, February 16, 1917.

MY DEAR EXCELLENCY: With reference to the subject of our conversation of the 27th ultimo, when your excellency informed me of the desire of the Imperial Government to receive an assurance that on the occasion of a peace conference His Britannic Majesty's Government will support the claims of Japan in regard to the disposal of Germany's rights in Shantung and possessions in the islands north of the Equator, I have the honor, under instructions received from His Britannic Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, to communicate to you the following message from His Britannic Majesty's Government:

His Britannic Majesty's Government accede with pleasure to request of the Japanese Government for an assurance that they will support Japan's claims in regard to the disposal of Germany's rights in Shantung and possessions in the islands north of the Equator on the occasion of the peace conference, it being understood that the Japanese Government will in the eventual peace settlement treat in the same spirit Great Britain's claims to the German islands south of the Equator.

I avail myself of this opportunity, M. le Ministre, to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

CONYNGHAM GREENE,
His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador.

To His Excellency VISCOUNT ICHIRO MOTONO,
His Imperial Japanese Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs.

On the 21st day of February, 1917, the Japanese Government replied to this communication of the British Government as follows (omitting formal part):

The Japanese Government is deeply appreciative of the friendly spirit in which your Government has given assurance, and happy to note it as a fresh proof of the close ties that unite the two allied powers. I take pleasure in stating that the Japanese Government, on its part, is fully prepared to support in the same spirit the claims which may be put forward at the peace conference in regard to the German possessions in the islands south of the Equator.

While the Japanese Government was waiting for a reply from the British Government it proceeded also to negotiate with the other allied Governments. Its message to the French ambassador at Tokyo was signed by the Japanese foreign minister and was as follows:

The Imperial Japanese Government has not yet formally entered into conversations with the entente powers concerning the conditions of peace I propose to present to Germany, because it is guided by the thought that such questions ought to be decided in concert between Japan and the said powers at the moment when the peace negotiations begin. Nevertheless, in view of recent developments in the general situation, and in view of the particular arrangements concerning peace conditions, such as arrangements relative to the disposition of the Bosporus, Constantinople, and the Dardanelles, being already under discussion by the powers interested, the Imperial Japanese Government believes that the moment has come for it also to express its desires relative to certain conditions of peace essential to Japan and to submit them for the consideration of the Government of the French Republic.

The French Government is thoroughly informed of all the efforts the Japanese Government has made in a general manner to accomplish its task in the present war, and particularly to guarantee for the future the peace of oriental Asia and the security of the Japanese Empire, for which it is absolutely necessary to take from Germany its bases of political, military, and economic activity in the Far East.

Under these conditions the Imperial Japanese Government proposes to demand from Germany at the time of the peace negotiations the surrender of the territorial rights and special interests Germany possessed before the war in Shantung and the islands situated north of the Equator in the Pacific Ocean.

The Imperial Japanese Government confidently hopes the Government of the French Republic, realizing the legitimacy of these demands, will give assurance that, her case being proved, Japan may count upon its full support on this question.

It goes without saying that reparation for damages caused to the life and property of the Japanese people by the unjustifiable attacks of the enemy, as well as other conditions of peace of a character common to all the entente powers, are entirely outside the consideration of the present question.

A few days later the French Ambassador replied to the Japanese foreign office, as follows:

The Government of the French Republic is disposed to give the Japanese Government its accord in regulating at the time of the peace negotiations questions vital to Japan concerning Shantung and the German islands in the Pacific north of the Equator. It also agrees to support the demands of the Imperial Japanese Government for the surrender of the rights Germany possessed before the war in this Chinese Province and these islands.

M. Briand demands, on the other hand, that Japan give its support to obtain from China the breaking of its diplomatic relations with Germany—and that it give this act desirable significance. The consequences of this in China should be the following:

They had not been broken at the time this correspondence took place—

First. Handing passports to the German diplomatic agents and consuls.

Second. The obligation of all under German jurisdiction to leave Chinese territory.

Third. The internment of German ships in Chinese ports and the ultimate requisition of these ships in order to place them at the disposition of the Allies, following the example of Italy and Portugal. According to the information of the French Government there are 15 German ships in Chinese ports, totaling about 40,000 tons.

Fourth. Requisition of German commercial houses established in China; forfeiting the right of Germany in the concessions she possesses in certain parts of China.

Upon receipt of this communication the foreign minister of Japan, on behalf of Japan, promised compliance with the request of the French Government contained in this letter. Similar negotiations were entered into with similar results with Italy, although the negotiations with Italy took place in Rome and not in Tokyo. Similar agreement was also made with Russia, and it must be remembered that at that time Russia was still in the war, and it was anticipated that at the close of the war she would have a place at the peace table.

It is thus clearly disclosed that while these leading Governments of the world were inducing China to get into the war, in order that they might secure her assistance and particularly that they might be able to get possession of the German ships interned in China's harbors, they were secretly plotting among themselves as to her destruction as soon as she had complied with their wishes and the war was over. This procedure applies with particular emphasis to the agreement between Great Britain and Japan. After they had gotten out of China all that was possible then it was agreed that at the council table England should assist Japan in her claim against China, and to compensate England Japan agreed to assist England in getting all the German possessions south of the Equator. It must be remembered, also, that these agreements were made in secret at a time when all the nations entering into them were proclaiming to the world that secret treaties and secret diplomacy must be forever abolished. Poor, weak China was not told by these great statesmen representing the highest civilized nations of the earth, that after she had assisted to the limit of her power in overcoming Germany, she herself should be pounced upon and her territory turned over to other nations, the same as it was proposed to turn over the territory of the common enemy. In all the annals of history I do not believe there is recorded an instance of a more disgraceful and dishonorable agreement to carve up the territory not of an enemy but of an allied friend. Let us bring this proposition home to ourselves. Suppose it had developed at the peace council that England, France, and Japan had secretly agreed that when peace was declared New England should be taken away from the United States and turned over to Canada until such time as Canada saw fit to relinquish her claim. Would there have been found anywhere beneath the folds of our flag a single individual who would have demanded that the Senate should approve a treaty of peace containing such a provision? Would any such agreement be considered, even if the treaty contained a provision for a league of nations that it was alleged would bring eternal and permanent peace to all the world? Would any American citizen have given a moment's thought to any other provision of the treaty, however valuable or however just? And it would have made no difference had the war been waged so fiercely that during its progress New England had been captured by the Germans, so that the treaty might have truthfully said that the possessions of Germany in New England should be turned over to Canada. Under these conditions is there an American citizen who loves peace so much that he would be willing to take it at such a sacrifice? And would we be any more liable to submit to such an outrage if during the war our Navy had been destroyed, our armaments all obliterated, and, like China, were in a helpless condition? Would the particular wrong be made any the more bearable or sufferable because we should happen to be in a weakened and crippled condition? Would it make the act just or excusable simply because we did not possess the power to resist? And are not the rights even of poor China as sacred to her as our rights are to us? And are we going to condone this outrageous perversion of justice simply because it is practiced upon some one that is weak? Are we going to give our official approval to this robbery of China simply because the principal actors in the cruel farce are the leading nations of the world? Can we afford to purchase peace at the sacrifice of honor? Such action would give the lie to every principle or declaration of justice that was ever made by our Government or any of our allies during the progress of the war.

It gives official approval to secret diplomacy after we and our allies have publicly proclaimed to the world that secret diplomacy was dead. It gives a death blow to the great doctrine of self-determination, for which it was claimed that this great war was, in part at least, fought and won. It writes falsehood upon every declaration that has ever been made by anyone during the progress of this war, that we must fight until we could have a peace that would give protection to the weak as well as the strong. It brands all the claims and protestations of our civilization with hypocrisy and nullifies every instinct of the human heart for justice and equality. And, Mr. President, these same nations are going to be the leading spirits in the league of nations that we are to set up by this treaty. If this is a sample of the justice that will come out of such a league, then what can weak and unarmed nations expect? This secret agreement entered into by the leading nations of the world, and the unjust judgment that followed it, shocks the sensibilities of those who honestly want to bring about a league of nations and causes them on the very threshhold to question and to doubt. Have we not a right to expect more of our boasted civilization? If the greed and avarice shown by the nations that have entered into this secret agreement to despoil China are to control the league that is to be set up, then God help the poor and weak who approach that throne expecting justice. And if we approve this wicked decree, is it any defense to say that we were the only member of the court that was not bribed? Can we shift the responsibility from our shoulders by claiming that we took no part in the procedure that took place in the darkness by which China has thus been despoiled? This judgment can not become operative without our official approval. If we ratify this treaty as it stands, we approve not only the judgment but the reprehensible method by which it was brought about; and if we thus approve it with our eyes open, do we not thereby become a party to it? Is there any possible gain that can come to us or to our Nation that will be sufficient to compensate us for taking such a step? Is peace so sweet or life so dear that we can afford to perpetuate them by giving our official approval to an act brought about by a procedure that would be disgrace to the civilization of the wild man and the barbarian?

If this treaty as it stands becomes operative, and later the 30,000,000 of Chinese in Shantung should rebel against the rule of the Japanese, and then if the balance of China should go to the assistance of their own brethren in attempting to overthrow the unlawful and cruel rule of a foreign government, then under section 10 of the league of nations as it now stands it would be our duty to contribute American lives and American blood on the battle field to assist Japan to retain her power. And are these suppositions unnatural or improbable? What other thing could we naturally expect than that these Chinese in Shantung should rebel? What would be more natural when they do rebel than that the balance of China should go to their assistance? We ought to remember that our approval of this unjust and wicked document may require the services of our sons on the battle field under the Japanese flag to maintain her supremacy in China's holy land.

This treaty should go back, and I believe if the American people could have an opportunity to see all the vice that it contains and were able to express their patriotic sentiments, it would go back practically by a unanimous vote. When the honest citizens of Great Britain, of France, and of Italy realize the injustice that it contains they will unite with us in demanding that it be rejected. In face of what we hope and pray will be a new era in civilization the world can not afford to take such a backward step. We can not build our temple for the future upon such a crumbling foundation, and I do not believe that the Senate of the United States will take the step that is here demanded of it, which, in my judgment, would constitute the blackest page in our Nation's history and be a constant reminder to those who shall follow us that we failed to do our whole duty. If we desire to build a temple upon whose front we can truthfully inscribe the divine motto, "On earth peace, good will toward men," the foundation must be constructed according to the golden rule, upon the principles of justice and equality, and not based upon the doctrine of hypocrisy and greed.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the report from the Presbyterian Mission, from which I read some extracts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 13, 1919.]

HORRORS IN KOREA CHARGED TO JAPAN—PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH MAKES OFFICIAL REPORT OF MURDERS AND TORTURES—CHRISTIAN TOWNS BURNED—INVESTIGATORS TELL OF AT LEAST 30 MEN DONE TO DEATH IN A CHURCH.

"A report of alleged Japanese atrocities in Korea was made public yesterday at the headquarters of the Presbyterian Church in America. It is a result of investigations by representatives in Korea of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, following the imprisonment of some of its missionaries by the Japanese authorities. The information from Korea was transmitted by such means that it escaped the Japanese censors.

"The report, which is several thousand words in length, is described by the Presbyterian Church in its introduction to the presentment as follows:

"'The American papers are already full to overflowing with the reports of atrocities in Korea. The origin and causes of these are of immense importance, but in this article these subjects can not claim our attention. Knowing that another Belgium is on the world's hands, it becomes necessary that the facts be stated by some one, and that these be held to form the basis of constructive reformation later on. This article is written with this idea in mind.

"'What is reported here can be duplicated in scores of places in Korea, and some of the reports thus far received are even more harrowing than the ones we report. But, as they have not been definitely established by competent witnesses, we omit them but confine ourselves strictly to incidents which are known beyond the shadow of a doubt to be true.

"'Many of these reports are repulsive in the extreme, and our readers' blood will boil with indignation as ours has who have witnessed these things. We make very few comments, therefore, and leave the facts to convey their own lesson. Were the conditions as they actually are to be fully reported the report would be extremely long and too horrible to relate.'

TORTURE OF POLITICAL SUSPECTS.

"Preliminary police examinations of Koreans suspected of complicity in the revolutionary movement are said in the reports of the investigators to include 'every human refinement in brutality,' men being beaten to death and women subjected to nearly every possible form of shameful treatment. Milder punishment, it is said, included 90 blows rained upon the prisoner's body with a bamboo rod, and the administering of many boot kicks, at the end of which the victim, if he survived, was sent almost lifeless to a hospital.

"One such victim, 'a slender, timid, Christian youth,' 19 years old, employed by a shoemaker, was arrested with a wealthy Korean, both charged with circulating the Independent News, a revolutionary publication.

HORRORS IN KOREA.

"The report proceeds:

"'At police headquarters they dealt with the wealthy man first, telling him that if he would disclose who was distributing the secretly published sheet, the Independent News, they would set him free. He told, and the shoe boy, who was his tool, received punishment for both.

"'Word came to me soon after this that our shoe boy had been frightfully beaten and would die. I was very greatly concerned about it. Thirty-three days later I was meeting with some women of the Fifth Presbyterian Church * * * and heard that the boy was in a dying condition in the public hospital. As there had been no report of his death in the meantime, I had hoped he would escape at least with his life. I went to see him yesterday at the hospital.

"'The only reasons which can account for his being there are either because the police did not want him to die on their hands or wanted to prolong his torture, for he is miraculously recovering. I entered by the main office, presented my card, and was shown to his room without any police interference, at which I was greatly surprised. I went in and saw a very sallow, sick boy—what must he have looked like five weeks before? I knew that God had surely sent me to him. I was there nearly an hour and a half. After his story I sang several hymns, had prayer with him, and departed for home.

"'The following is his story. * * * It certainly is a miracle that he is living. On the day following his arrest he was questioned about complicity with the Korean independence movement.

THE ORDEAL OF A YOUNG PATRIOT.

"'On refusal to reveal aught of the affair he was subjected to six hours of "examination" spelling constant torture, for his arms were put into rings above the elbows until the upper body was greatly distorted—the usual preparation for beating. Beating and kicking were then administered until he fell fainting to the ground. He was given cold water to drink, and water was poured over his body to bring him to again. Then more questions were plied, but the same refusal to reveal facts followed, also physical collapse.

"'I saw one sear on the upper part of the leg. It had been seared some 5 inches in length by a red-hot iron. Of these he bears four. I saw the dead-skin line of the welts that had been raised by blows on his hands. One hand, he said, had been swollen to twice its normal size. Two joints of one finger and two finger ends showed plainly the tale was all too true. His head is still sore from the blows received.

"'Shortly the doctor called on his regular rounds and seemed to take great pains in examining him. Turning to me, he said his chest and lungs were better. Was it exposure to cold that made his chest sore? No. He pulled his clothing down to examine further, and I saw that his whole abdominal region had been involved. A wound—whether by bayonet thrust or doctor's incision I do not know—seemed to be healing. The doctor began by pressing, but after 33 days this boy was unable to endure even a slight touch from chest to groin and from hip to hip. An ice bag was at his head for fever, body was quite wasted to bone, and he was only just able to raise himself to a sitting posture.

A MISSIONARY UNDER SUSPICION.

"'During the four days of torture and the subsequent two days of suffering at the police station a physician had been admitted to see him only three times. He was expecting to die and begged them to kill him. But God had another plan. After 20 days in the hospital he has hopes of recovery.

"'I rode in a ricksha, as I had little time, delivered him some eggs, apples, milk powder, a clean cover for his pillow, with clothes, and the transformation was wonderful. For the clothes he had on had the marks of his experiences from the first. A Korean nurse was in attendance during the visit; the reason I understood later.

"'His soiled clothes were rolled up ready to take along. We had prayer, and I rose and was leaving the room when a coolie confronted us outside the door. He spoke to the sick boy and said: "You must wait; you must not go." About me he said I should go to see somebody. Imagine, please, what they were trying to work up against me—that I was trying to get the boy away in my ricksha. I was in for arrest.

"'He calmly strode into the main office. Over a half hour elapsed ere anything happened. Imagine my terrible plight! I had purchased fish for dinner, and guests were expected. There really was little time to spare. However, I dispatched a woman with the fish and a note, and sat down to wait in patience, for the last thing to do in the Orient is to get flustered.

"'I certainly was the object of much attention. I wondered how many soldiers would come to take me away, and whether they would let me ride or make me walk. Finally my amused meditations were broken, not by khaki-clad armed soldiers but by a plain-clothes Japanese detective, who had come in to interview me. I told him all that I knew, and he was exceedingly mild toward me, when I tell you he was the one who at the police station almost tortured our shoe boy to death. He is the acknowledged spy on all foreigners and the official torturer of our schoolboys.

"'The interview was brief, he saying that the sick boy was yet a prisoner, and hereafter if I wished to visit him I must first apply to the police for permission. It was like thin ice, seeing how far I could go without breaking through. I was really disappointed, for I thought I was going to get inside the jail for sure. A community phone call had been sounded, announcing that I was missing, and a member of the legal committee was about to set out for the police station when I returned.

"'We foreigners enjoy little freedom, nor are we safe under the present Japan and United States of America agreements. Ask Uncle Sam.

MANY CASES OF TORTURE.

"'This case is not an isolated one. Scores, hundreds, of similar cases could be cited and fully substantiated. Every police station is a veritable hell on earth. Every human refinement in brutality is known there, and such brutality is perpetrated as would blister the tongue to utter. Men are known to have been beaten to death, and their bodies handed over to their relatives to bury. Others have been beaten until crippled for life, and then released, to be a burden on their families until the day of their death. * * *

"'Note that the shoe boy had been in the hospital 33 days already when the interview was held. When will he be ready for trial? Still, it is understood that he is to receive nine months in the penitentiary. This was practically decided by the police officers even before being brought to trial. The court simply goes through the form of trying him, and sentences him as the police have suggested.

"'Occasionally, instead of imprisoning the men, they are let off with only 90 blows of the bamboo rod, and that this is no light matter you may well imagine. No man could endure it all at once, so the 90 blows are administered 30 per day for three successive days. A large number of cases now coming to the private hospitals are of men who have been thus beaten until they are nearly done for.

"'All this in a land which boasts before the world of its thoroughly acquired modern civilization, an associate of the great allied nations of the world. * * * When will such mockery as this end and men be called what they really are?'

REVOLTING TREATMENT OF WOMEN.

"The following is a signed statement by an American residing in Korea, dated April 22, 1919:

"'The examination of women who have been arrested for activity in the independence movement is the most disgraceful and humiliating possible. It will have to be remembered, however, that the Japanese feel no shame when nude in the presence of the other sex. On the other hand, the Korean and Chinese women have the same feeling of delicacy as Europeans. They feel intense shame when seen by another.

"'The Japanese know this, and so when they put the Korean women in the question box—this, mind you, is before they are condemned at all—they are stripped absolutely naked. They are stripped not after they go to the room where they are questioned, but in their rooms of confinement, and that by gendarmes.

"'From here they have to walk across an open court, where they can be seen by anyone who pleases. Sometimes they are accompanied by a Japanese female and sometimes not. It might also be said that each time they wash they have to take off the thin kimona which they wear in prison and stand naked before others while they wash.

"'Their arraignment is before men, of course, and the chief part of the examination is to make the pain of the humiliation just as intense as possible. Unmarried girls, as well as Bible women who have lived in homes of refinement and who have been used to nothing else than the courtesies due their sex, are thus outrageously treated. They are called bad women in the most revolting terms just because they have shouted in the street, "Hurrah for Korea!"

"'Some women who tried to cover themselves had their hands tied behind them. One Bible woman had her arm wrenched out of its socket by this process. * * *

"'But this is not all. Some were kicked in the stomach and otherwise roughly treated by these fiendish men. Some of us have heard terrible tales about the German treatment of women in Belgium and France, and, though the awful depths have not yet been reached here, we see the training of the same school.

"'In one section of the country the women are not safe in their homes during the day. They spend the daytime in the hills and come to their homes only at night.

"'The Japanese are great sticklers for the truth when it comes from others. So let others read and understand. We have here sworn statements from women thus treated, which can be produced when needed.'

CHRISTIAN VILLAGE WIPED OUT.

"Christians murdered and burned by Japanese soldiers."—Japan Advertiser, Tokyo, April 29, 1919.

"The following is the most terrible story yet verified. The American vice consul and the British acting consul, as well as many others, have personally visited the scene and have protested against such acts. The governor general was compelled to admit the offense, and the following article gives the general fact:

"Statement of H. H. Underwood, a missionary resident in Seoul, as to trip to neighborhood of Pal Tan, market town in country of Buwon-Kyongki Province, April 16:

"'Party left Seoul about 9.30 a. m. by writer's auto and proceeded to Pal Tan by way of Buwon and Osan, a distance of slightly over 46 miles in all. About 2 miles before reaching Pal Tan a large cloud of smoke was seen rising from behind a market town. The car was stopped for lunch here, and the writer strolled over to a near-by cluster of houses and, finding a farmer, engaged him in conversation. After a little preliminary talk the following took place:

"'H. H. Underwood. What is that smoke?

"'Farmer. That is a village that has been burned.

"'H. H. U. When was it burned?

"'F. Yesterday.

"'H. H. U. How was it burned?

"'F. (glancing around fearfully). By the soldiers.

"'H. H. U. Why? Did the people riot or shout for independence?

"'F. No; but that is a Christian village.

"'After lunch we drove to the town, leaving the car, as it was impossible to cross the stream at the entrance to the town. We walked past the police station, which is situated where the two main roads entering the town meet. A file of soldiers of the Seventy-eighth Regiment was standing outside the station. As we were passing a Japanese policeman came out and demanded where we were going, ordering us into the station. We entered as two Japanese officers got up and left. We all noticed their shoulder straps, which are red, with three stars. This, I am told, is the badge of first sergeant. The policeman who had ordered us into the station shouldered a carbine and followed the officers. In a moment we saw them setting off on the road to Nemyang, with the policeman in the lead.

"'Mr. Curtice then presented his card to the officer and conversed with him in Japanese. I do not speak Japanese, but I know a little, and followed a large part of the conversation. After chatting about the roads, bridges, mutual acquaintances in Seoul, etc., Mr. Curtice asked about the fire. The chief said there had been a small fire, but that it did not amount to much.

ONLY "A LITTLE DISTURBANCE."

"'When asked about the disturbance he said that there had been a little disturbance in that part of the country, but that it was now over. Some more general conversation took place. Mr. Curtice asked if rickshas could be procured in the town, as we would like to make a little excursion to see the fire. The chief asked, "What fire?" Mr. Curtice said the near-by one, and that we would probably like to take a little ride of 3 or 4 miles in the country.

"'The chief seemed a little surprised, but said, "Yes," and sent a policeman with us to the ricksha stand, where we hired three rickshas and set out. The village from which the smoke was rising was not more than a mile from town, and after a short ride we left the ricksha and walked around the foot of the hill on the sides of which the village had been.

"'Our estimate and the statements of the Koreans that the village had consisted of about 40 houses agreed. Only 4 or 5 were left standing. The rest were heaps of smoking ashes, with flames still visible here and there. We saw groups of women, children, and old men sitting on the hillside above the village watching the ruins in dumb despair.

"'We walked the entire length of the village, and about halfway up saw the corpse of a young man terribly burned, lying just outside a building which we learned later had been the church. This body was photographed where it lay.

"'After going the length of the village we came back along the hillside and called to a man sitting in one of the groups mentioned. He held his head in this hands and said that everything he had and all the results of years of hard work had gone. I condoled with him and asked when the fire occurred. He said, "About this time yesterday (2 p. m.)."

"'H. H. Underwood. How did it start?

"'Korean. Why, the soldiers.

"'H. H. U. Were many people burned or hurt?

"'K. The soldiers killed all the Christians who were in the church.

"'H. H. U. What were they in the church on a Tuesday afternoon for?

"'K. The soldiers came and ordered all the Christians to gather in the church.

"'H. H. U. Were there women in the church, too?

"'K. No; the women were told not to come.

"'H. H. U. Well, after the Christians gathered in the church what happened?

"'K. The soldiers fired on them and also used their knives, swords, and bayonets, and then set fire to the church.

"'H. H. U. How did the houses catch?

"'K. Some caught from the church and others on the other side, where the wind did not carry the flames, were set on fire by the soldiers.

"'H. H. U. How is it you are alive?

"'K. I am not a Christian, and only the Christians were ordered to gather.

"'H. H. U. Your house was also burned?

"'K. Yes; there are the ruins [pointing].

"'H. H. U. But there are a few houses left. How about those?

"'K. Those stood by themselves, and after the fire had been set in several places if the rest did not catch they did not set them on fire.

THIRTY KILLED IN A CHURCH.

"'H. H. U. About how many were killed in the church?

"'K. Thirty.

"'I then left this Korean and walked over to another group. Here there were several young women with babies and old women and a young boy of about 19 or 20. These people were Christians and knew Dr. Noble, of the North Methodist Mission, in whose district this church was. I asked the same, or nearly the same, questions, and got the same answers as to time, method, number killed, the setting of the fire, etc.

"'I asked the young man how he happened to be alive, and he replied that he had been away gathering wood on the hills and had returned at night to find all his male friends and relations dead and buried under the flaming ruins of the church.

"'The people were absolutely destitute. Here and there a few household goods had been snatched from the flames, but none of the little groups seemed to have more than a very small bowl of rice or grain for all the survivors, and they said that most of them had lost their grain seeds for the coming year and everything, including domestic animals, on which they were very dependent.

"'We bid good-by to the group, after taking their picture, and walked through the village to one of the houses that was still standing. Here one owner was a very old man, who said that his house stood alone and had not caught fire and had not been set because he was not a Christian. His account of the event tallied in every way with that of the others.

"'He also did not know how many had been killed, but put the number at about 30. After taking a few more photos we returned to the rickshas and started back to the town. The ricksha coolies offered to take us to another place about 3 miles farther on, where the same thing had happened a few days before. They volunteered that about 15 places had been burned, and in most cases Christian centers.

"'This tallied with other stories and with reports brought up to Seoul to the missionaries in charge of the district. The soldiers had been brought in by auto about 2 weeks or 10 days before, and the first villages had been burned at that time. The chief of police had reported that the trouble had been over for some time, and we heard no accusations that there had been any violence on the part of the Koreans in this village which we visited; but the police claim that violence had been committed in other places. We bade good-by to the police and returned to Seoul by auto, as we had come, reaching Seoul about 5.30.

"'The governor general says that the lieutenant in charge of the troops who committed this crime has been punished. We should like to know whether this means removal from his present post and promotion to a higher position somewhere else.

THE BURNING OF TYUNGJU CHURCH.

"'The burning of the Christian church buildings seems to be a favorite pastime of the military, including the police, at present. Attempts are made to prove that the burning is done by nonbelievers who are disgusted with the Christians and are anxious to get rid of them. But the evidence is too strong against the military that they themselves are inciting the people to do the work, while they usually take a place in the background and are righteously indignant when the crimes have been committed. Yes; there are cases, as you can see from the article on the murder and burning of Christians above, that they have done the deeds themselves.'

"We give two accounts herewith of the burning of the church at Tyungju, North Pyengen Province. The one is by the Seoul Press, a government-controlled paper, and the other by the pastor of the church, an American missionary, who saw the church and made careful investigation. The reader is at liberty to draw his conclusions:

"'Christian church burned. (Seoul Press, April 13, 1919.)

"'On Tuesday, at 6 a. m., fire broke out in a Christian church at Tyungju, site of a district office in North Pyengen Province, and the whole building was reduced to ashes.

"'The loss is estimated at 10,000 yen. It is suspected that some Koreans, detesting the purposeless agitation, have been driven by their bitter indignation to commit incendiarism at the expense of the church.'

"The following is from the pastor of the church:

"'Burning of Tyungja church. On April 8 gendarmes came to the large, newly built church in Tyungju city, gathered the mats and other furniture together, and set fire to them. They also put out the fire. The Christians have been bending every energy to the building and paying for this building.

"'On April 9, at night, as on the 8th, a large pile of combustible material was heaped upon the pulpit and set on fire. A deacon of the church rang the bell and a few Christians came together and put it out. The next morning the police commanded the Christians who had houses near the church to move away, the pretext being that they had set fire to the church.

"'On April 10 combustibles were put all about the church and soaked in coal oil and then set on fire. They also rang the bell, but no one came, and the church burned to the ground.

"'On April 11 the wife of the pastor and some of the church officers were called up and rebuked for burning the church. They also gave them a lecture on what low-down rascals the Christians were, stating that not a single person would come out to help put out the fire. As a matter of fact, any appearing on the streets at night are severely beaten and otherewise mistreated.'

"There was a statement in the Japanese press that Christians set the church on fire to show their disapproval of the leaders of the church in the independence movement. No comments needed.

"In conclusion, after publishing what are alleged to be violently anti-American articles from certain Japanese newspapers, the report of the Presbyterian investigators says:

"'It is unnecessary to say more. These articles speak for themselves. The reader can judge of the attitude of the press when the Government permits such stuff to be printed. As the press always is under the censor here, when such stuff is printed the Government becomes morally responsible. The truth is prohibited. Falsehoods and libels are allowed. Such a course of action only endangers the relations of the Governments concerned.'"

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the war has sapped the foundation of society. It came very near to destroying all hope for lasting peace for this generation of men. In a world broken away from the fundamental principles of right and justice for the protection of humanity, where no court of common arbitration exists, where the selfish passions and desires of men are the ruling cause that shapes their course, where no ideals of equity and fair play are established as a guide to human conduct, the sword—the sword alone—must and will shape the destiny of suffering humanity.

Must we continue to make the sword the sole arbiter of justice and right, or has the time arrived in the progress of the world's civilization when the sword shall become merely the instrument by which the decrees of nations, founded on established principles, shall be enforced? An ever-increasing sense of public justice, sustained by the ever-strengthening power of freedom of thought and action among the masses of men, is crystallizing into a universal sentiment in civilized nations for the recognition of a court of final judgment to guide the future destiny of the world, rather than leave the decision to the blood-stained decree coming from the battle field.

I am forever opposed to war, except a war of defense. Peace should be the foremost policy of our country. There may be nations who in the past were forced to make war that they might live. Not so with us; our fathers gave to us as a sacred heritage the most wonderful country that has ever cradled a great civilization in the progress of the world. Great, fertile plains, capable of producing food for a population ten times larger than our own, mountains and hills holding in their everlasting embrace treasures of raw material such as the world knows not of elsewhere—coal and iron, lead and copper, gold and silver—with but few exceptions, every raw material that is needed to build the greatest industrial nation that the dreams of man can imagine. We possess a people who for industry, courage, and virtue stand unrivaled on the globe. Within our borders we are a world to ourselves, possessing every attribute that makes man strong, great, and self-sustaining. We stand alone, the foremost Nation on our hemisphere, protected on all sides with natural barriers to defend us from the aggression of a foreign foe.

You may say: "Then, why should we become involved in an alliance that may drag us into the disputes, the disasters, and the dangers of other nations?" This was the doctrine our fathers believed in, and one that I am slow to yield. But we face a condition, not a theory. Since the foremost patriot of all the great men who have held allegiance to our flag advised his countrymen against becoming involved in entangling alliances the mind of man has invented, discovered, and perfected the railroad and the steamship, the telegraph and the telephone, the submarine and the aeroplane, the high explosives and the deadly gases. In Washington's time men voyaged across the sea for more than a month to reach the European shore; in our day men have flown across the Atlantic Ocean in 16 hours. Time and space have been eliminated. Dangers to our people and our Republic that were not dreamed of a century ago confront us to-day at our very doors, a threatening menace to our lives, our civilization, and our institutions. Shall we continue to dream of the ideals of the past, or meet as practical men the dangers of the future? For me there is but one course to pursue.

The era of territorial expansion has passed; the era of social development is here. We must face the conditions as we find them. Many of the difficulties of the past arose from the fact that the countries of higher civilization were becoming densely crowded, and those of more primitive life controlled large unoccupied areas, possessing vast natural resources. The instinct inherited from the tribal life of remote ancestors remained the governing cause that guided the course of nations long after it was repudiated as being unmoral in the life of individuals. For the last four centuries, the policy of most of the great nations has been to settle the waste places, and if it could be done without too much danger, to exploit the lands of their weaker neighbors. Force was, and continued to be, the foremost virtue of national life, until it took the combined strength of the world to destroy the last great monster, reared through a century of treason against humanity and imbued with the desire to absorb and destroy all other peoples of the world, their commerce, and their ideals, making the sword the sole arbiter of the destiny of man, and enthroning force as the ideal of modern civilization.

Has the suffering of the Great War taught us nothing? Must we lapse back to the barbarous national morals of the past, without an effort to reach out for a new ideal of national life that will make it as unmoral for a nation to murder, rob, and plunder because it has the power as it has been for an individual to do so? Has not the time come for the universal establishment of order and justice, the development of national resources for the benefit of all, the establishment of the freedom of the seas to the commerce of all lands, the repudiation of the grinding down of the weaker peoples of the earth, the restraint of international greed and monopoly by the enlightened nations of the world in a high court of good morals, and the destruction as a common enemy of any nation that hereafter claims the right to live by the sword? If this be true, then we must not close the book of the Great War without making an earnest effort to baptize anew the Old World into a new and moral life for national existence.

The most important treaty that has ever been negotiated is now pending before the Senate of the United States for ratification, amendment, or rejection. It purposes to end the Great War, to restore our country to peace conditions. It comes to us after many months of deliberation and consideration by ourselves and nations with whom we have been associated in the war. Its terms have been acceded to by the nations with whom we have been at war. It is not the product of the desires or the conclusions of any one nation, but it reflects the compromises that the compelling power of the world's desire for an early peace has forced the allied nations to accept and agree upon in order that the peoples of the whole world may hereafter pursue the paths of peace and abandon the pursuit of war. Under these conditions it can hardly be expected that the terms agreed upon will be entirely satisfactory to all the parties to the contract, and in some of its details it probably does not reflect the sentiments of any of them. The question that confronts the Senate is not whether the treaty reflects the views and traditions of the American people entirely, but as to whether, taken as a whole, it is best to accept it in its entirety and immediately end the period of the war, or as to whether some of its terms are so repugnant to the true interests of our people that we should reject the treaty by amendment or repudiation and endeavor at a later date to reopen the peace negotiations with the hope or expectation of improving the terms from which we desire to dissent.

The contract treats with the most momentous problems that have ever been dealt with at any one time in the world's history. The map of the world is to be changed. Old landmarks are to be destroyed and new ones erected. The governments of hundreds of millions of people are to be changed and reestablished. The commercial and industrial life of the world is to be reorganized and readjusted. Great indemnities are to be exacted from the fallen foes, and restraints in armament, industry, and commerce placed upon them. These questions, and many others, were the burning issues that surrounded the peace table at Paris. They represented the future life of great nations and many peoples. They were the vital issues to be solved. They were questions of to-day, but most of these issues are not in close contact with the life of our own Nation. Although they may mean much to us in the future, their importance is not realized by the people of our country to-day. So far as I have heard, there seems to be but little sentiment, if any, reflected in the public prints and in the talk of men against the acceptance of the verdict of the tribunal of peace so far as it relates to these grave and important matters. The discordant thought of the people at home relates to a question of the future, and not to the issues of the present. The foremost question in the mind of America to-day is the future preservation of the peace of the world, and well may this be so. We were a peaceful, industrious Nation, living without the desire to despoil our neighbors, content within ourselves, seeking only after high ideals of justice and right in all the affairs of national life—patient to an extreme degree with those who affronted us, endeavoring always to keep the peace—and yet, without fault on our part, without the desire for war, a ruthless foe fired on our flag, sank our ships, and, without our having any opportunity to avoid it, drove us into the bloodiest war that the world has ever known. We were compelled to sacrifice many thousands of lives of our brave and gallant sons. In carrying on the war we have spent billions of dollars that will be a burden on our lives and our resources for more than a generation to come. We profit nothing as a result of the war, except that profit which comes to all men who stand courageously for the right and strike down the wrong—the profit that comes from the honor and respect of the peoples of the world. Well may we say, "Has the world gained anything by the destruction of the barbarous Hun, if the conditions that he created in this war may come again?" And, therefore, the question that is foremost in the thoughts of our people is whether or not it is possible for man to establish a rule of law and justice as a substitute for the rule of power and force.

From these sentiments has come the desire for a league of nations, a coming together of the peoples of the earth to establish a high court of justice for the final arbitrament of the disputes of men that have heretofore carried their peoples to the battle fields of the earth. I hear no one dispute the fact that it is far better to settle national disputes by arbitration rather than by the sword, and it appears to me that the sole contention in reference to the approval of those clauses in the pending treaty of peace that establish a constitution for a league of nations is whether the proposed plan is strong enough in itself to accomplish the desired end, or whether the strength of the plan may lead to the destruction of national independence and interfere with the great principle of self-determination in the inner life of the nations of the world.

There have been many causes of war in the past, but the dominating causes of war among the great nations of the world have been the desire for the possession of lands and colonies, commercial concessions and expanded markets, the enlargement of national domain that appeals to the sense of greatness and power, and the desire of each particular nation to dominate and rule the internal affairs of other nations. These great causes of war may be paraphrased in two words: "National selfishness." Until the civilization of the world is prepared to dethrone its own selfish ideals and to recognize the rights of other peoples, the inherent causes of war must continue to exist.

I am not prepared to say that the adoption of the present treaty carries within itself the elimination of these causes of war or that in the end there will be no more wars; but I do say that within the folds of this treaty we find an agreement between the great nations of the world that will probably in the future carry the questions of national dispute to a court of final arbitration, and in many, if not most, instances avoid the horrors and injustices of war. For my purposes in this argument it is not necessary to refer to the clauses affecting the organization of the league of nations. The league is a form of government, and every Government must have defined the details of its organized life and the principles for which it was created. In passing, let me say that I do not regard the organization of the league as a supergovernment. No supergovernment could exist without power to maintain itself. Within itself the league has no power to levy taxes, and without revenue a government can not long exist. The league has no power to raise armies and navies, and without military forces it can not defend itself. It is therefore not a supergovernment, but a federation of States, dependent for its existence upon the future voluntary acquiescence in its continued life of a few of the great nations of the world. Within the terms of the contract is carried the provision that any of the signatory powers to the created organization may withdraw upon giving two years' notice. The announcement of withdrawal from the compact by either France, the United States, or Great Britain would at once destroy the binding force and moral power of the league in the world's affairs. So, with the right to withdraw, I feel that there is no need to fear the dangerous surrender of any of the fundamental principles and rights of the American people. Therefore I am willing to take it and try it and hope that from the seed that is planted to-day, in its fruition the final peace of the world may be found.

I am more interested in the principles enunciated in the clauses relating to the league of nations than I am in the powers given for its government, for on these principles the future life of the league must depend. I would have been glad to subscribe to a contract that would have arbitrarily limited the armaments of the world. Such a decree is not found within the contract, but there is a covenant that seeks to keep the peace of the world, that authorizes the executive council of the league to consider how much the present armaments of nations should be reduced, and submit its conclusions to each member nation of the league, which may then agree or not agree to accept the recommendation. In other words, each nation will finally agree to the limitation of its own armament and, having so agreed, must keep it as long as it remains a member of the league. This is not a strong or a definite agreement, but out of its terms I am hopeful that there will come a gradual disarmament of the world, the lifting of the burden of the preparation for war from the shoulders of striving humanity, and the greater inducement to settle disputes through the high court of arbitration rather than the decision of brutal force.

Another vital principle that we are asked to agree to is that all of the members of the league shall submit differences between them that are not capable of being settled by negotiation before a tribunal to be composed of judges or arbitrators agreed to by them, and after entering into the arbitration they are required to abide by the award. Should either party to the dispute refuse to agree to arbitration, the executive council of the league is required to mediate between them and endeavor to secure a voluntary settlement of the questions involved. If it fails in this, the council is to report on the facts. If the report is unanimous, the member nations are to carry it into effect. If it is not unanimous, it is to be published, and there the matter will end, so far as the league is concerned, except that the moral suasion of the verdict rendered may have the power to avoid the arbitrament of arms.

Another principle involved that will aid the world in guarding against war is a clause in the covenant which provides that the nation shall not begin war until three months after the arbitration award or the recommendation of a compromise. This undoubtedly will operate as a great restraint against war. It is not at all probable that nations involved will not allow the three months' limit to expire before attempting actual hostilities under any circumstances and take the chances of bringing on their heads the condemnation of the other nations of the world. Three months' time for consideration and reflection, with the world looking on and discussing the problems involved, is more likely to point the road to peace than to find the way to war.

The greatest principle of the league tending to keep the peace of the world is that which declares that "the high contracting parties to this treaty shall undertake to respect and preserve against external aggression the political independence and the territorial integrity of every member of the league." Most of the wars that have been waged in the ages that have passed have had as their governing cause the desire to conquer and control another people, or to expand the territory of the country that is the aggressor in the war. Prevent the incentive for wars growing out of a selfish desire for aggression, as the overweening force of this covenant will do, and few actual causes of war will remain that can not without difficulty or danger be submitted to the high court of arbitration.

I have therefore reached the conclusion that, as a Nation, we will be better off in the world's affairs by accepting the terms of the organization of the present league of nations than to destroy all opportunity for the establishment of a world's tribunal of peace by the rejection of the treaty at this time, and I shall therefore cast my vote against all amendments proposed to the treaty that may delay its ratification and send it back to Paris for further delay and deliberation. I shall vote for the ratification of the treaty as a whole, believing, as I do, that although it may have imperfections within its folds, and it may not express in its entirety the high ideals of everlasting peace, yet that it is a long step in the right direction. It is the building of the road that leads away from the war and the cruelties of strife. It is the starting of the highway of peace, that may ultimately carry us to the establishment of the high principles of equity, right, and justice between all men of all nations.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on the subject of a league of nations.

Assuming that it were possible to form a league of nations which would—

First. Insure to the peoples of the world a lasting peace, by the prevention of wars between nations;

Second. Preserve the sovereignty of the citizens of the United States so that they would at all times be free to decide questions affecting their own nationality and inherent rights, such as control of immigration and the levying of proper tariff rates; and

Third. Leave exclusively to the decision of the United States Government the policies which it could adopt, from time to time, for the control of its foreign affairs and in dealing with other nations—

Such a league would appeal to me as one to which the United States should subscribe as a member.

The covenant for a league of nations as incorporated in the treaty of peace being negotiated with Governments of the Central Powers and other nations does not properly provide for any one of the three conditions above named; therefore, in my opinion, it should not be approved by the Senate of the United States without first making certain reservations or modifications which would cure these defects.

The suggestions for amendment proposed by Hon. Elihu Root appear to cover what is needed to put the covenant in acceptable form, although further changes may be deemed advisable. I believe that the thorough discussion by the Senate of the proposed league and of the treaty of peace is a national duty, with a view to seeking, fairly and impartially, the most practical methods to be employed for the maintenance of a lasting peace. While it is probable that the problems involved can be worked out in a satisfactory manner, which I hope will be done, and the approval of the Senate given, I am strongly opposed to the acceptance of the league in its present form.

It has been my endeavor to give earnest consideration to this most important subject with an open mind and without reference to party affiliation. My strong feeling has been that the interests of the United States are paramount and must be given precedence, while the affairs and claims of foreign nations are only entitled to take second place, in the consideration of the subject by the Senate.

A WORLD CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I read this morning an editorial written by Mr. C. P. J. Mooney, the editor of the Commercial Appeal, of Memphis, Tenn., entitled "A world constitution." It strikes me as one of the most intelligent and thorough discussions of the necessity of a league of peace that I have read for some time. I therefore desire to have it inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

A WORLD CONSTITUTION.

"Unless the Senate of the United States ratifies the treaty of peace as it is now written the Great War will have been fought in vain.

"The part the United States took in the war will be a waste of human life, property, and suffering unless there follows something by which the dangers of recurring wars are reduced.

"The thing offered is the league of peace. No document is more simple. It is clear and definite. It seeks to bring about a concert of action between all of the great powers of the world, under which disputes between nations and quarrels between races may be adjusted without a resort to violence.

"The main points of the opposition urged against the league by our Senators and their supporters are similar to the main objections to the Constitution of the United States when it was up for ratification. There were many brilliant men, most of them erratic, who are yet famous in the history of America, that opposed violently what we have come to regard as the greatest guarantor of our national life and our personal liberties.

"The Constitution of the United States brought 13 independent States together. For many months several States held out against ratification, and it was finally adopted after an exceedingly close vote in New York. This victory in New York was due to the work of Alexander Hamilton.

"Our Constitution has survived the changes of more than a century. It survived the great Civil War.

"When the Constitution was adopted it provided for an adjustment of disputes between States and for a settlement of differences between citizens of various States through a Supreme Court. This great court has developed every principle in the Constitution which had to do with the right and liberty of the citizen. It has rendered decisions which have been obeyed without question. In other countries such decisions might have caused a change of government or a resort to violence. To the glory of the Supreme Court of the United States, no citizen and no State have ever been deprived of a privilege or a right which justly belongs to him or it.

"The league of nations is a world constitution. Its supreme object is the liberty and peace of peoples. Going into it, no nation will be deprived of any present right or privilege.

"There are other things in these days than brute force by which adjustments are made. Order and peace can be maintained by good sense and common sense. When the peace league has made a decision the common sense and good sense of the world, of the members of the league, behind that decision will ordinarily cause its enforcement.

"England and the United States have for the last hundred years adjusted many sharp disputes by arbitration. The United States for a hundred years has brought about peaceful settlement of acute questions with Russia, Germany, Italy, Japan, and France. It is true we had a war with Spain, but that war was for the liberation of a people.

"So, if two nations agree by a set of treaties to adjust questions peacefully, may not a combination of nations, by one general treaty through one great clearing house, also adjust their differences?

"Suppose the United States, after the armistice, had quickly withdrawn from the conference, and suppose that nothing except individual treaties had been made with Germany. There would have been merely a recess in war.

"For 50 years Germany has worked hard for an idea that the German people have held for 1,200 years—since the days of Charlemagne. That idea is that the Teutonic race is superior to other races, and therefore should dominate the world. Germany has been controlled by this idea for 1,200 years and has been feverishly working to put it in force for 50 years. Germany will not give up the idea within six months.

"It is necessary, then, for the other nations to hold together under some sort of compact until this thought is extirpated from the minds of Germany and the Teutons come to realize, as Frenchmen, Englishmen, and Americans do, that they are not by nature superior to other people and have no right superior to other people.

"The world can not stand for a hundred years such a war as we have gone through. Even now we realize the damage that has been done to the established order. The waste of this war must be repaired. England, France, and Italy must be rehabilitated. We must have a season of peace to readjust our own affairs. In the league of nations there is the only hope of directing the mind of the world into peaceful channels.

"During the war we demanded that certain subject people should be made free. These new nations are like toddling infants. They must be held by the hands until they are able to walk alone. If they are now left to their own devices, it would have been better for them had they not been given a vision of liberty.

"And yet some Senators say that we should live to ourselves. The logic of this is that we should trade only among ourselves; that our people should not go through the lanes of the world. We should become as remote from the rest of the world as an interior country of Asia. We should close our minds, ears, and eyes to all things outside.

"It was the lack of isolation that helped us win our liberty. The first act of the United States after the Declaration of Independence during the War of the Revolution was an 'entangling alliance' with France, and owing to that 'entangling alliance' we and the French were able to beat the British.

"If we are to remain a civilized and enlightened people we must undertake the duties that civilization and enlightenment impose upon us. At first the cave dwellers sought to live without entangling alliances. Human society could not begin to form until after the cave dwellers changed their viewpoint. China and Korea sought this method. Look at them now. Japan abandoned seclusion.

"The Senators say the Monroe doctrine is threatened. These Senators to be logical should, if they oppose the league of nations, also demand the abrogation of the Monroe doctrine.

"The Monroe doctrine was fought by a great force in America because 'it committed the United States to an interminable series of foreign wars.' The Monroe doctrine is intact with us as a member of the league of nations. The league of nations is a development of the unselfish principle of the Monroe doctrine, and applies it to the entire world.

"The opposition of the Senators is partisan and personal. The Members of that body have fooled away months in discussing the treaty of peace, even before it was before them. They want to continue to fiddle while this country is threatened with conflagration. The people should demand that they ratify the treaty, and ratify it at once, and then that they try to develop their intellects so as to grasp some of our tremendous domestic problems.

"The country is running away with itself. We are in a hectic stage of getting money without working for it. We are in the midst of an orgy of speculation and gambling. The necessaries of life, more abundant than they have been for a generation, are mounting sky-high in price. Labor is discontented, and has a right to be. Instead of organization there is disorganization. The laboring man and capitalists are both getting big profits, but these profits are apparently on paper. In many cases they do not purchase those things necessary for the well-being of the individual.

"We should have a program of legislation for the happiness and the good of people.

"Heretofore our legislators have measured prosperity in dollars and cents. It is a false measure.

"Legislation should tend toward making living conditions tolerable for every man who has the will to labor.

"The Senate should ratify the treaty at once and then give attention to these things. For there are certain evil forces, material and spiritual, at work in this country which will destroy us unless they are overcome.

"A majority of the American people are behind President Wilson. He tells them that 'the treaty and the league promise peace to the world.'

"Those who have taken part in the great struggle, and their fathers and mothers, want that thing done which will reasonably guarantee against a repetition of the bloody transactions of the last four years.

"The treaty is an assurance of peace. A rejection of the treaty is a bid to war, to anarchy, and to chaos."

ALLEGED GERMAN-JAPANESE TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to call up Senate resolution 110, of which I gave notice yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments.

The amendments were, in line 1, after the word "be," to insert "and he is hereby"; in line 3, before the word "treaty," to strike out "the" and insert "any," and after the word "treaty" to insert "purporting to have been projected"; in line 5, after the word "annexed," to strike out "and to inform the Senate whether such treaty has been abrogated under clause 2 of article 289 of the treaty with Germany or whether it is still in force and effect" and insert "together with any information in regard to it which may be in the possession of the State Department, or any further information concerning any negotiations between Japan and Germany during the progress of the war," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with public interest, to send to the Senate a copy of any treaty purporting to have been projected between Germany and Japan, referred to in the press dispatch hereto annexed, together with any information in regard to it which may be in the possession of the State Department, or any further information concerning any negotiations between Japan and Germany during the progress of the war.

"JAPAN AND FOE IN SECRET PACT—SOVIET GOVERNMENT MAKES PUBLIC TREATY BETWEEN NIPPON EMPIRE AND GERMANY.

"(By United Press.)

"BUDAPEST, June 20.

"The Soviet Government to-day made public in a wireless dispatch from Moscow the following version of an alleged secret treaty negotiated between Japan and Germany:

"'First. Both parties undertake to lend a helping hand to the third treaty party (Russia) as soon as compatible with the world's political situation, for the restoration of her internal order, international prestige, and power.

"'Second. Japan undertakes the granting to Germany of advantages resulting from the most favored nation reciprocity clauses of the existing Russo-Japanese treaty.

"'Third. Japan undertakes to permit Germany to participate, in accordance with concessions embodied in this special treaty, in Japan's preferential treaty rights in China, the parties undertaking to exclude foreign powers (United States and Great Britain) from securing further concessions there.

"'Fourth. Japan undertakes the safeguarding indirectly of Germany's interest in the forthcoming peace conference, striving for minimum territorial and material disadvantages to Germany.'

"The dispatch declared that the alleged treaty was negotiated by Oda, Japanese plenipotentiary, who arrived in Stockholm on October 18, 1918, to begin secret conferences with German Ambassador Lucius. The Bolsheviki claim that Oda transmitted to Tokyo secret German overtures for a separate peace.

"Oda and Lucius, agreeing upon the principles of a treaty, later went to Berlin to complete the draft, the Bolsheviki charge. The German Government approved the document, it was said, but the revolution rendered it impossible of execution.

"The alleged existence of such a treaty was first definitely asserted by Foreign Minister Tchitcherin in a recent interview with the United Press. The Bolsheviki's bitter opposition to the alleged treaty and their desire to make it public results, Tchitcherin explained, from the fact it could only become operative through their overthrow and the restoration of the Russian Empire."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I voted against a favorable report on this resolution in committee, but I do not propose to resist its passage at this time any more than to make a protest against resolutions of this kind, based on such a slender foundation and having the natural effect of indicating to a friendly country, an associate of ours in the war, that the Senate of the United States gives credence to newspaper reports of this character.

It seems to me that to ask the President of the United States in this public and official way whether he has information to the effect that Japan during the war negotiated with Germany with a view to making a separate peace is unworthy of the Senate. No possible good can come of it. There is no substantial foundation for believing that there was such a negotiation.

If the Senate of the United States or if the Committee on Foreign Relations desired to get any actual information it could have secured all the information by a private conference with the President that it can possibly secure by this open declaration.

I object to this resolution because it implies that those who introduce the resolution and those who pass the resolution give credence to the report that Japan took this attitude during the war. I think it is unjust, I think it tends to interfere with the friendly relations existing between the two countries, and I can see no possible good that can come of it.

I shall, however, not resist passage of the resolution because I realize that the votes are here to secure its passage, but I hope when the reply comes from the President it will be the last attempt that will be made by the Senate of the United States to go on a fishing excursion for the purpose of breeding trouble.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the information about negotiations of Japan with Germany was printed in a dispatch of the United Press which I appended to my resolution, but that is by no means the only information in regard to it. It appeared also in the Far Eastern Review. I have a memorandum here from the Far Eastern Bureau of New York which is engaged in the far eastern business, giving all the details, with which I do not wish to burden the Senate. It does seem to me that where we are making a treaty which includes Japan and includes the gift to Japan of some 36,000,000 Chinese, which will tend to build up very much the Japanese power, we at least ought to know whether there is any truth in the very detailed statements which have been published both by one of the very great press associations and by the Far Eastern Review. For that reason the Committee on Foreign Relations reported this resolution of inquiry.

It has been stated that a copy of this alleged treaty is in the hands of the State Department and has been for some time. Of course it is entirely open to the President to refuse the information if he sees fit, but I think it is perfectly reasonable that we should know about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not like to let go without any comment the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts that this treaty involves a gift to Japan of Chinese territory with thirty or forty million Chinese——

Mr. LODGE. I did not say that treaty. I said the treaty that is before us involves a gift to Japan.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand; I mean the treaty that is before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if the Senator wants to discuss the Shantung provision now, it is open to him to do so, but I wish he would let us dispose of the pending resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am going to discuss it for a few moments, with the Senator's permission.

Germany, as the Senator very well knows, got her rights and privileges in the Shantung Peninsula by a treaty with China which was signed in 1898.

Mr. LODGE. I wish the Senator would tell the whole story about that treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, I am going to do so.

Mr. LODGE. Begin with the missionaries who were killed and the German fleet that went there and extorted the treaty under the guns of the fleet.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I repeat that Germany got her rights and privileges in the Shantung Peninsula by a treaty which was signed in 1898. That was 21 years ago. When this war started Japan became a party to the war, and at the instance of the other nations involved in the war attacked Germany, then in possession of those rights and privileges and properties in the Shantung Peninsula, and by act of war Japan took those away from Germany in November, 1914. That was two years and a half before the United States entered the war, and it was two years before China entered the war.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator believe that the treaty between Germany and China which he mentions was a treaty that was in force and that we ought to respect?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the Senator's question and I will answer it in this way: I will say it was a treaty which was acknowledged by the whole world, including the United States, when Mr. Hay was Secretary of State.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was acknowledged under the Republican administration of Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator acknowledges the treaty, then he acknowledges it in toto, does he not? Does the Senator acknowledge part of it and abrogate a part of it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have had nothing to do with the acknowledgment. I am reciting history. I am saying that Germany had a good title, as titles go, to the rights and privileges in the Shantung Peninsula, and that the United States officially, by the State Department when Hay was Secretary of State, acknowledged and recognized Germany's rights in the Shantung Peninsula.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; now, let us assume that. Take that just as the Senator has it. That treaty contained a provision that no rights given by China to Germany under it should be assigned to any other nation without China's consent. If the Senator accepts the treaty, he must take that provision with it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. China has consented.

Mr. NORRIS. By what authority did they give the rights of Germany to Japan without China's consent?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. China gave her consent by the treaty of 1915.

Mr. NORRIS. By the treaty that we have before us now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. China gave her consent by the treaty of 1915.

Mr. NORRIS. With Germany?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Which China made with Japan, in which China said that she would acknowledge and respect and accept any arrangement that Japan and Germany made with respect to the German possessions in the Shantung Peninsula.

Mr. NORRIS. That was a treaty which was made in 1915?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was.

Mr. NORRIS. It was like the other treaty. It was forced on her. It was absolutely forced upon her, and everybody knows it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not discussing how it was done; I am discussing the fact that China——

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is claiming that Germany's rights in China were by virtue of a treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And while I do not believe Germany obtained any rights by that kind of a treaty, I am assuming now that she acquired just what the Senator claims; but that treaty itself provided that Germany should not assign any of those rights to any other nation without China's consent; and I am only contending that if you take the position that Germany did acquire any rights——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I decline to yield to the Senator to make a speech.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator has got to stand by all of it or none of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I decline to yield further. My colleague imposes upon the privilege of interruption and takes the floor away from me.

It is true that the treaty of 1898 between China and Germany contained the provision that the rights should not be assigned without the consent of China, but China gave that consent by another treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. China did not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. China gave that consent by another treaty made in 1915; and that treaty can easily be put into the RECORD, if the Senator is not satisfied with my statement. So I say that the right which Germany had on the Shantung Peninsula was one which had been secured by treaty, and that that treaty was acknowledged and recognized amongst other ways by the United States in a note signed by John Hay, written on September 6, 1899, in which Mr. Hay complimented Germany for the liberal policy adopted with regard to certain customs collections in that Province.

Therefore, I repeat, that Germany's title has been acknowledged; it existed 21 years ago; and it has been acknowledged by every nation in the world. Whatever title Germany had was taken away from Germany by war by Japan two years and a half before we became involved in the war or had any right to say what Japan should do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And by treaty with China.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Therefore I object to the intimation of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that in the existing treaty now before the Senate a gift has been made to Japan of 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 Chinese people. As a matter of fact, Japan only secures rights, privileges, and concessions in the Shantung Peninsula, and the sovereignty over the Shantung Peninsula remains and rests in the Chinese Government.

Mr. President, that is not all. China gets something by this treaty which is greater than any asset she has heretofore had. China by the treaty now before the Senate gets the full benefit of article 10, which is so viciously attacked upon the other side. [Laughter upon the Republican side of the Chamber.]

Senators laugh, but Senators know very well that in the past most of the nations of the world have despoiled China and have taken her territory.

Mr. LODGE. And they are doing it now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; Senators should know that under article 10 no further spoliation can occur. They know that there is an absolute promise that the territorial integrity and the political independence of every nation shall be respected.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is something that has not heretofore existed.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will suspend for just a moment. Senators who desire to interrupt the Senator from Nebraska must first address the Chair.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. I understand the Senator from Nebraska to object to the language used by the Senator from Massachusetts in describing this transaction as a gift to Japan, and I also object to that language; I think it is more accurately described as a bribe; and I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will accept that correction?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will not accept it.

I have not any patience with the crocodile tears that Senators are shedding over China. Senators now sit here and shed crocodile tears over China when in the past they have never raised their voices in the defense of China and protested against the spoliation of that empire. But here in this treaty, in the form of article 10, is a guaranty that in the future China can not be despoiled.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not also true that the treaty between Germany and France by which Alsace-Lorraine was given to Germany was approved by the entire world; and does the Senator think, then, that the recapture of a part of Alsace-Lorraine by American soldiers would entitle the United States, under his theory, to have Alsace and Lorraine given to us?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, there are so many answers to that question that I hardly know how to take them up. The fact is that one of the objects of this war, admitted and proclaimed on the floor of the Senate, was to restore to France the territory taken away by Germany in 1871.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In the next great war one of the objects will be to restore to China what has by this treaty been taken away.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, I do not know whether the Senator is any better prophet than he is statesman; I do not know whether or not that will be one of the objects of the next war; but I know that China is a beneficiary under this treaty. I know also that whatever title Germany had Japan acquired by right of war before we entered the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And by treaty with China.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; and by treaty with China, of course. I have stated that—by two treaties with China.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I notice that the Senator from Nebraska—and I thought very gracefully—congratulated his colleague on the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], yesterday upon his eloquent remarks. Does the Senator from Nebraska agree with his colleague on the committee as to the construction placed upon article 10 by the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not sure that the Senator from Virginia said anything regarding the construction of article 10 in the connection to which the Senator from New Mexico now refers.

Mr. FALL. Well, to sum up, I thought the conclusion of the Senator from Virginia was that we need not be frightened, for article 10 did not amount to anything.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from Virginia said nothing of the sort. In my opinion, and I am sure in the opinion of the Senator from Virginia, article 10 is one of the most, if not the most, important provision in the treaty for the purpose of preventing wars of conquest in the future. Under that article every member of the league agrees to respect the political independence and existing territorial integrity of every other member of the league.

Mr. FALL. Yes. It goes further than "respect"; it agrees to protect.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. "Preserve" is the language.

Mr. FALL. "Preserve." How is that to be done, in the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is to be done as stated in the article. When there is danger or action indicating a war of conquest against any member the executive council is directed to advise and recommend to members of the league the action that they shall take to protect the threatened member.

Mr. FALL. There is nothing in it, then, that compels any action at all?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there is everything in it which would appeal to sovereign nations like the United States to carry out the purposes of the article.

Mr. FALL. It does, then, convey an obligation? It either does or does not convey an obligation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from New Mexico says so.

Mr. FALL. I ask the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It does.

Mr. FALL. Convey an obligation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; it does convey an obligation.

Mr. FALL. Then, by agreeing to it, we are obliged to preserve the territorial integrity of the Japanese Empire with all of its possessions?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; certainly.

Mr. FALL. So, being under obligation to do that, if Japan calls upon us to assist in driving the Chinese hordes away from Shantung, in the event the Chinese Republic undertook to recover Shantung——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the Senator from New Mexico is entirely mistaken.

Mr. FALL. Then, under the Senator's construction, we would be obliged to send our boys there?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not at all. The Senator from New Mexico was never more wrong in his life than he is at this moment.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will just bear with my ignorance and enlighten me, I will be very grateful to him, certainly, and I will make any promise if the Senator will merely inform me now what he does believe about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not going to make a speech at the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico. I have risen here for the purpose of resenting the statement that the United States and the other nations which are entering into this treaty are making a present to Japan. We are not making a present to Japan.

Mr. FALL. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are not giving a bribe to Japan.

Mr. FALL. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are simply recognizing the facts of history and the facts of the present. The facts of history are that Germany had title and Japan took it away from Germany by war; that Japan holds what she has taken; and there is no present given her either in this treaty by one nation or by all of the nations.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. McCORMICK. How did Italy secure possession of Fiume, then, if not by an act of war?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That question is highly pertinent. The Senator from Illinois knows very well that all that territory is now under the jurisdiction of the conference at Paris to settle its disposition. There is no treaty in existence by which Italy claims possession of Fiume. Italy by the secret treaty which was in existence made no claim to Fiume. Fiume is one of the disputed territories under the jurisdiction of the council at Paris which is endeavoring, in the face of a very difficult race question, to decide what the disposition of it shall be. There is no parallel case between Fiume and Kiaochow.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator holds, then, that the United States is bound to observe those secret treaties?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the United States is not bound to observe those secret treaties. The United States has protested against them.

Mr. McCORMICK. The United States is bound to observe the published treaty, then, for the transfer to Japan of German rights in Shantung?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Ah, the Senator very well knows that those treaties are not only public but years ago were recognized by the United States under a Republican administration.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Nebraska does not follow me, I think. No Republican administration recognized any agreement under which the British Government expressed its pleasure in acceding to the Japanese demand for Shantung.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is now introducing foreign matters that I have not been discussing and that I do not propose to discuss. I am discussing the rights of Japan on the Shantung Peninsula, and I want to deny the intimation made by the Senator from New Mexico that Japan has secured or that Japan claims any rights of sovereignty over any territory in the Shantung Peninsula. She has railroad rights; she has mining rights; she has commercial rights in Kiaochow. She has no rights of sovereignty, and this treaty gives her no rights of sovereignty.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. MOSES. Did I understand the Senator from Nebraska to state a few minutes ago that this action embodied in the treaty was to make the treaty conform to the facts as they existed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, I did not fully say that; the Senator has changed it somewhat. I said that men recognize the existence of historical facts and present conditions in making treaties.

Mr. MOSES. And that this treaty in this instance was made to conform to that recognition?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I assume that it was; yes.

Mr. MOSES. Then, I ask the Senator, Mr. President, if I am justified in assuming that this is one of the instances of which the President spoke to us the other day when he said that the 14 points, now of an historic and evanescent fame, have been made also to conform to the facts?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, the Senator can draw his own conclusions. I have done what I wanted to do.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am surprised that my very innocent resolution of inquiry should have brought on such an animated debate; but now that the Senator from Nebraska has finished resenting, I will correct my remarks. I said a gift to Japan; it was a price paid, and all the world knows it.

I shall discuss the question of Shantung with some fullness at a later time; but now let me say that there is no statute of limitations which runs against a great wrong like that. Poland was partitioned 150 years ago, and that great wrong is being undone now. The fact that we recognize Germany's seizure of Shantung does not make it any better. Germany had two missionaries killed there. She sent out a fleet, with Prince Henry of Prussia on board, and for those two missionaries she took Kiaoshow and Tsingtau, which are the great ports and harbors of Shantung; she took a circle about it, the environs, and she took great rights extending throughout the province in connection with railroad, mining, and other concessions. Japan took all that away from Germany during the war. England and France took Belgium away from Germany during the war; but does that give them a claim to Belgium? Japan took Shantung, and she also took the precaution to make an agreement with England that England would sustain her in holding the control of the Shantung Peninsula in taking over the German lease of 99 years. England stated that she would be very glad to do it, it being understood that Japan would support her in taking the islands south of the Equator. Japan made a similar arrangement with France. Shantung—and I use that word for brevity, it includes all the German lease rights which have been handed over to the control of Japan and Kiaoshow and Tsingtau and the environs absolutely—is not enemy territory. It is not like Fiume, for Fiume was enemy territory, while Shantung was the territory of a friend and ally.

China came into the war, took the German ships, and sent 200,000 men—she was an unarmed and pacific nation—to labor and work in the trenches and on the railroads behind the line. Many of them were killed; most of them came from the very Province of Shantung. That province was handed over to Japan against the protest of some of our delegates and against the protest of the experts who had charge of that particular question. It was handed over because Japan's signature was needed for the league; it was done as a necessity; and that is the only defense I have heretofore ever heard for it. The territory of an ally, of a friend, who had been loyal to us, was handed over to the great military power of the East. Japan is building up a vast power in China and we are helping her do it.

England stood by and saw Germany take away from Denmark Schleswig-Holstein; she stood by and saw Germany destroy Austria and make it practically a vassal State; she stood by and saw Germany wreck France in 1870; she gave Germany the island of Heligoland; and she has been paying the bill for those awful mistakes in the last four terrible years. She has done it nobly, splendidly, but at a terrific cost. Beware of building up an Asiatic Russia as German Prussia was built up.

There is another great power being built up on the other side of the ocean, and we who are not a party to any secret treaty, an independent Nation with no personal ends to serve, are asked to put our approval at the bottom of that treaty which provides for the robbing of China, handing over this great province to the control practically of Japan. I put aside the question of interest, although it is a very great one, indeed, but I for one do not wish to see my country's name at the bottom of such an agreement as that. I hope it will not be placed there, but at least I know we shall have the opportunity, those of us who do not want our names to go on that record, to vote against giving to Japan this additional vast hold on the continent of Asia at the expense of an unarmed Republic, of a friendly people who were our allies in the war. I think it concerns us nearly to know what Japan has been doing, and that is the reason I reported the resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is because of the tensity of the moment resulting from a somewhat impassioned debate that I have determined to call the attention of the Senate to a recent discussion of the Shantung incident by an author of established reputation in the last number of the World's Work. In doing this I am neither approving nor disapproving his narrative, but, inasmuch as we are a friendly Nation, enjoying at the present time relations of the most amicable character with Japan, I think it is due to her, to this country, and to the Senate that something be submitted on the other side, and I submit this as perhaps a better statement than any that I could make and perhaps any that any Member of the Senate could make without considerable preparation.

This article is entitled, "Japan, the Peace, and the Destiny of Asia," and is from the pen of Richard Washburn Child, one of the most reliable and best known of the modern magazine and newspaper contributors. Mr. Child gives a preliminary account, historical in character, of the circumstances under which Germany acquired Kiaochow. With the morality of Germany's action in that regard I have no words but those of condemnation, but it is a fact that she did acquire control of that section of China and that she held it and fortified it and was in possession of it when the World War broke out in August, 1914.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Whatever the character of the possession, in whom did the true sovereignty of the Shantung Peninsula rest?

Mr. THOMAS. With regard to that, my recollection is that the concession from China to Germany consisted of a 99-year lease of Kiaochow, with certain rights of a commercial character, involving railroad building in the Province of Shantung.

Mr. FALL. And with rights of an administrative character in connection with all those enterprises?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and with rights of an administrative character in connection therewith. Japan entered the war against Germany on the 23d day of August, 1914, after having notified Germany, in the precise language which Germany employed against Japan a few years before at the close of her war with China, to evacuate all of her possessions in China. It took the Japanese two months and two weeks thereafter to occupy Tsingtau, and the capture was made, according to this author, on the forenoon of November 7. On November 11, just four years to a day prior to the end of the war, the conqueror formally entered Tsingtau.

It will be remembered, Mr. President, that Japan announced her intention then of recapturing these concessions in China that she might restore them to China, the original and only legitimate owner. I now take up the narrative of Mr. Child.

Half a year after the Japanese occupation of Tsingtau a note was exchanged between Japan and China providing for the return of the "leased" territory to China after the war on certain conditions. The four conditions specified in this note of May 25, 1915, are as follows:

1. Opening of the whole Kiaochow as a commercial port.
2. Establishment of a Japanese settlement in the locality to be designated by the Japanese Government.
3. Establishment, if desired by the powers, of an international settlement.
4. Arrangements to be made before the return of the said territory is effected between the Japanese and Chinese Governments with respect to the other conditions and procedures.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. The last proviso, of course, would require time for its execution, though whether it would be necessary to occupy as much time as has elapsed between the 24th day of May, 1915, and the meeting of the world's congress I can not say. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator about the fourth proposition. That contains the meat and pretty near all the meat in the coconut, as I look at it, and provides that the arrangement must be brought about by an agreement between China and Japan. I wish to ask the Senator if, knowing the history of Japan in such matters and the weakness of China, does he think that settlement will be anything more or less than what Japan wants? Is it not about the same as though China had turned it over at once to Japan?

Mr. THOMAS. I must reiterate that my purpose in reading this account into the RECORD just now is that it may go to the public with the comments that have been made upon the action of the congress in Paris regarding Shantung, and not because I am prepared to indorse the completeness of this statement as a justification for that action.

Answering the Senator's question directly, I may say, of course, that when two countries or two men arrange and negotiate upon subjects between them, and there is a great disparity of strength and power between the contracting parties, the conditions are very apt to be as the Senator suggests.

But this author proceeds:

That Japan intends to live up to this promise is proved by the address before Parliament on January 21, 1919, of Viscount Uchida, Japanese minister of foreign affairs. He then said that Kiaochow, on acquisition of the right of free disposal from Germany, would be returned to China "in accordance with the terms of the notes complementary to the treaty of May 25, 1915, regarding the Shantung Province."

The so-called secret treaties of 1917 have no negative effect on the foregoing note or any of its conditions. Baron S. Goto, former minister of foreign affairs in Japan, speaking in New York on May 6, 1919, said:

"The so-called secret treaties entered into in 1917 between Japan and her allies, recognizing her right to inherit German rights in Shantung, were nothing but a step toward the fulfillment of that pledge which she had given China in the agreement of 1915. In the judgment of the Japanese Government, it was necessary for Japan to establish an undisputed right over the German territory before she was in a position to restore it to China. Now that the peace conference has granted Japan's wish, the Government of Tokyo will take steps without delay toward the restoration of Kiaochow to China. Not only will Japan restore Kiaochow to China, but she will undoubtedly enter into hearty cooperation with the Government and people of China for the development of Shantung Province."

On April 30, 1919, the Associated Press filed the following dispatch in Paris:

"The agreement regarding the Shantung Peninsula and Kiaochow which has been reached between the council of three and the Japanese delegates provides for their transfer without reserve to Japan, which voluntarily engages to hand the Shantung Peninsula back to China.

"Japan, as an economic concessionaire, gets only such rights under the agreement as are possessed by one or two others of the great powers. The whole future relation between Japan and China, as well as the territorial integrity and political independence of China, is to come at once under the guarantee of the league of nations."

Baron Makino, one of the Japanese peace delegates, gave an interview to the Matin on April 30, in which he said: "We are accused of intending to occupy Kiaochow permanently. This is inexact. We have agreed to restore it to China. Our agreements will hold—our agreements always hold. There is no example in history of Japan breaking her word. It is just because nobody has the right to doubt our honor that we ourselves should be allowed to arrange restitution and not be compelled in a way that would indicate unjust suspicion."

Sufficient statements of Japanese statesmen have been cited to show that Kiaochow will be returned to China according to the conditions expressed in the note of May 25, 1915.

To Japan will go a Japanese settlement in Tsingtau, but the other powers, if they desire, will have an international settlement. Japan, the United States, and other powers will benefit equally from the opening of all Kiaochow as a commercial port. China will benefit.

Negotiations will be conducted between Japan and China to settle the question of the future ownership and control of the Tsingtau-Tsinanfu Railway and the collieries developed by the Germans.

The remainder of this article is devoted to a discussion of the Chinese complaint.

Mr. President, I put that into the RECORD for what it is worth, and for no more. When an appropriate time comes, I may have something to say with regard to my own view of that feature of the treaty. At present I reserve judgment, merely with the remark that in our discussion of these matters I do not think it is always fair to assume that our Allies—and they are still our Allies—are actuated by any more dishonest or dishonorable motives than lie behind our own actions at the peace conference.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. FALL. I simply desire to ask if included in the article is the official protest of the Chinese delegation made at the peace council?

Mr. THOMAS. No. There is a discussion of the Chinese position; but the protest to which the Senator refers, and which is published in the magazine issued by the New York Times, is not in the article, and it might be extremely appropriate to introduce it into the RECORD in connection with this statement.

Mr. FALL. I was going to ask the Senator, as he has read part of it, if he would include that.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be very glad to do it, or I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall introduce it now. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Chinese people themselves are entitled to be heard upon their understanding of and—if they have any—their objections to the action of the peace conference in this matter.

The Chinese delegation in Paris issued a statement on May 2 expressing dissatisfaction with the decision. The statement in full reads:

The Chinese delegation has been informed orally on behalf of the council of three of the outline of the settlement proposed regarding the Shantung question. Under this settlement all rights to Kiaochow formerly belonging to Germany are transferred to Japan. While Japan voluntarily engages to hand back the Shantung Peninsula in full sovereignty to China, she is allowed to retain the economic privileges formerly enjoyed by Germany.

These privileges, the delegation is informed, refer to the Tsingtau-Chinan Railway, 280 miles long, the mines connected with it, and the two railways to be built connecting Shantung with the two trunk lines from Peking to the Yangtse Valley. In addition she obtains the right to establish a settlement at Tsingtau, and, although the Japanese military forces, it is understood, will be withdrawn from Shantung at the earliest possible moment, the employment of special railway police is permitted.

Such being the outline of the proposed settlement, the Chinese delegation can not but view it with disappointment and dissatisfaction.

These German rights in Shantung originated in an act of wanton aggression in 1897, characteristic of Prussian militarism. To transfer these rights to Japan, as the council of three proposes to do, is, therefore, to confirm an act of aggression which has been resented by the Chinese people ever since its perpetration.

Such a virtual substitution of Japan for Germany in Shantung is serious enough in itself, but it becomes grave when the position of Japan in southern Manchuria and eastern Mongolia is read in connection with it. Firmly intrenched on both sides of the Gulf of Pechili, the water outlet of Peking, with a hold on the three trunk lines from Peking and connecting it with the rest of China, the capital becomes but an enclave in the midst of Japanese influence.

Moreover, owing to China's declaration of war against the Central Powers on August 14, 1917, and the abrogation of all treaties and agreements between China and these powers, the German rights automatically reverted to China.

The significant part of this protest, Mr. President, was the last paragraph read, with reference to the position of Japan in China if she is allowed to retain the railroads and the Japanese concessions in the Shantung Peninsula—that the capital of China itself is absolutely in the hands of Japan, surrounded entirely by Japanese influence.

Mr. President, it was this transaction to which the President of the United States, in addressing himself to the Senate a few days since, had reference. The President himself is too shrewd a man and has too much regard for his own standing in the eyes of the people of the United States to undertake to make such a defense as has been attempted to be made for him upon this floor. The President of the United States may not be all that some of his worshipers think he is, and in some respects I am frank to say that I think he is as much overrated as any man who ever lived in the United States, but I can say without hesitation or mental reservation that when it comes to a proposition where he may be held to account he is as shrewd as any man who ever addressed a public audience in leaving himself a position from which he can gracefully retire, and then he is equally shrewd in delegating to others, who either have not his ability or have not his regard for the position in which they may place themselves, the ordinary work—I will not use the other expression which I might use—in undertaking to make a defense of such an absolutely indefensible proposition as is presented before the Senate of the United States, and one which the President of the United States, standing before us, would not defend.

I want to read what the President said:

It was our duty to do everything that it was within our power to do to make the triumph of freedom and of right a lasting triumph in the assurance of which men might everywhere live without fear.

Old entanglements of every kind stood in the way—promises which governments had made to one another in the days when might and right were confused and the power of the victor was without restraint.

Note what the Chinese say with reference to Prussian militarism seizing or raping the Shantung Peninsula in 1907:

Engagements which contemplated any dispositions of territory, any extensions of sovereignty that might seem to be to the interest of those who had the power to insist upon them, had been entered into without thought of what the people concerned might wish or profit by.

And I invite the attention of Senators who will read it, who care to inform themselves upon this proposition, to read the notes, respectively, of Great Britain and France in answer to the Japanese propositions upon the Shantung question, where Great Britain immediately said, "We will agree with you that you may have such rights as Germany had," and where France even went further, and then, on the other hand, asked Japan to yield a certain few things to Great Britain and France, respectively.

And these could not always be honorably brushed aside—

Continues the President, excusing himself.

It was not easy to graft the new order of ideas on the old, and some of the fruits of the grafting may, I fear, for a time be bitter.

In the eyes of the President, in the conception of the President of the United States, the rape of Shantung was a bitter fruit, and he was compelled to engraft upon the new ideas this bitter fruit of the old ideas; and yet to the minds of some of his worshipers it is not bitter fruit, but a sweeter could not be rolled in the mouth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am very glad, indeed, that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has read as much as he did of the President's address to the Senate. The President attended the conference, the American delegates attended it, as the representatives of our one Nation. They did not go there with the power of making every provision of the treaty of peace to suit themselves. Like every other instrument making a contract between various nations, it was necessarily an instrument of compromise here and there. As the President, in addition to what the Senator from New Mexico said, added, in addressing the Senate, that not every provision of the treaty met with his satisfaction, and he supposed there were no representatives of any nation on the earth that entirely approved every provision of the treaty. Five great nations and nearly a score of other smaller nations meet for the purpose of bringing about peace and terminating a war, and Senators in this body talk as if they would have had them split to pieces at the conference table and go to war with one another—the very worst thing that could have happened for the world; the very thing that Germany hoped for, and that the wisdom of France and Great Britain and the United States and Italy prevented. It was hoped that little things like Fiume, the Shantung Peninsula, and some other things, perhaps adding to the power of Belgium up in the neighborhood of Holland, might create dissensions that might lead to an adjournment of the conferees, and thereby to a delay of peace, and therefore possibly to a separate treaty with Germany by this, that, or the other of her enemies.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] insinuates that the theory of a separate treaty on Japan's part had already begun. I do not know. I do not believe it, because I believe in Japan's good faith; but all the time Germany was hoping for a separate treaty with Italy, and then, Russia being in anarchy on the east, Poland not yet upon her feet, Esthonia and Lithuania and all the Baltic Provinces and Finland as well being up in arms, not only against the balance of Russia but against one another, it was evident if Germany could have gotten a breathing spell and come back with Italy or somebody else in the west or Japan and Bolshevist Russia in the east in alliance with her to a fresh beginning of hostilities, the very worst thing that could have happened to the world would have followed. There is no use in saying that the German Army was whipped when this war terminated. I have seen that Americans claim that they whipped it, the British claim that they whipped it, the French claim that they whipped it, but it never was routed to the very last day. Germany herself had lost her morale; the army had to some extent lost its morale as a reflection from home; but that magnificent military machine was there, and is there yet, and do not let yourselves forget it. On an order of 48 or 72 hours, if they had a promising arena upon which to play, they could be remobilized and put almost anywhere upon the borders of Germany.

In his short, impassioned speech the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made a mistake about a vital fact. Shantung was not the territory of a friendly power at the beginning of this war. Shantung was the occupied, possessed, and fully governed territory of an enemy power at the beginning of this war; and there is no denial of a historical fact, no matter by whom made nor how important his opinion may be. Shantung had gone to Germany by her own fraud and force and by the acquiescence or the quiescence of the world. A shameful act, yes—in pay of the lives of two missionaries to seize 36,000,000 people, or certain concessions amongst them, together with entire control of ports and harbors. Shameful, yes; part of the old order of things in which there is so much more of shame than there is of credit to the nations of the earth. But Shantung was German territory when this war opened—German possessed, German occupied, German ruled and governed—everybody else verboten—garrisoned by German troops, held by the German Empire under a treaty with China—a treaty made by force, yes. So was our treaty with Mexico made by force. So was the treaty with France at the end of the Napoleonic wars made by force. So is this treaty with Germany now made by force. Are Senators going to deny the binding authority of treaties when made by force?

Now, whatever the right or wrong of it may be—and the wrong of it stood out so that a man with moral perception enough to fill a nutmeg could see it—the treaty had been made and acquiesced in, not only by everybody else but by us.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one moment.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is right about one thing. He speaks of Great Britain bringing endless punishment and expense upon herself by acquiescing in various things that took place on the Continent of Europe. We acquiesced in them, too. If she was stupid, so were we. There is no denying that both of us were. The only difference is that the penalty of the stupidity struck her more quickly and more directly in the face. We made no protest about robbing Denmark of Schleswig-Holstein. We made no protest even about invading Belgium, contrary to all treaties. We made no protest about cutting Alsace-Lorraine from the very side and flank of France. If you are going to go back to all the wrongs in history and talk about Great Britain and ourselves "acquiescing" in them, both seeking peace, your conversation will be endless. But the fact remains, and it is a historical fact, first, that China had by treaty given certain territory and certain concessions in Shantung to Germany; secondly, that Japan had whipped the German forces in Shantung and had taken Kiaochow and the other places thus ceded, and had asserted her military power over the territory—German territory at the time—and, third, that China entered into a treaty with Japan in 1915, which has been read, together with the qualifications and modifications of it, by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which acknowledged the status, and ceded Germany's ill-got gains to Japan.

Those are the historical facts; but I am the last man here present to urge them as the sole or sufficient reason for this provision in this treaty. The real reason for this provision in this treaty was that Japan was going to walk out and quit, and make no treaty, and probably make a separate treaty with Germany, unless that point was yielded. Japan had already applied to have racial equality recognized under the treaty, and she had failed. Then she came up, buttressed—buttressed, mark you—first by a treaty with China; secondly, by a treaty with Great Britain; third, by a treaty with France; fourth, by an understanding with Great Britain, France, and Italy, and Italy felt compelled to stand by her—they had given their word. Now, how could President Wilson be expected to overcome these four great principal allied powers, when all that was in the treaty was that Japan got the rights which Germany had held, with modifications to surrender those rights upon the fulfillment of the four conditions under the Chino-Japanese treaty of 1915, which the Senator from Colorado read?

Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator says that the territory in Shantung did not belong to China at the time the war began.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It did not for the time of the lease, 99 years.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, Germany had certain lease rights there, but the sovereignty of Shantung was in China, and China was exercising it. That, however, was not the question which I rose to address to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Right there the Senator is wrong. The absolute sovereignty during the lease of Kiaochow Harbor was in Germany, and the right and power to control which constitutes practical sovereignty rested in Germany.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator is mistaken. Germany had certain economic rights there, but the political sovereignty was in China. But that is not the question which I rose to submit to the Senator. Did Germany have any rights of any nature or kind whatever in China when the Versailles conference met?

Mr. WILLIAMS. She did not, because they had passed, first, by conquest, and, secondly, by the Chinese-Japanese treaty, to Japan.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; precisely. They had passed to Japan under the solemn promise of Japan to the United States that she would return them to China.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and that is a part of the treaty of 1915 which Japan made with China. The Senator has no right to say Japan will not keep her word.

Now, Mr. President, to proceed, I want to say that there is always the presumption of good faith when two nations enter into a treaty with one another. That the presumption is frequently disappointed goes without saying, but for you to take for granted in this august body that Japan is not going to carry out in good faith the terms of her treaty with China and her treaty with the allied powers, of which her treaty with China is a part, is insulting to a friendly nation and a late associate in war.

I want to say another thing. Unlike some Christian nations, Japan has hitherto kept her word. I believe she is going to keep it now.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to add that if Japan does not keep her word, then the league of nations has a right to hear the Chinese cause over again under that clause of the covenant of the league of nations which leaves questions of interpretation of treaties to the determination of the league. When these conditions are fulfilled, if Japan does not comply with the treaty, then the question of the proper interpretation and fulfillment of the treaty will come before the league of peace, and that league will have a right, if it thinks it a correct conclusion after hearing the evidence on both sides, to say that in order to comply with a proper construction of the treaty Japan must vacate Shantung.

I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says, "if Japan kept her promise." I assert here that Japan has never kept a treaty engagement with reference to China or Korea that she has ever made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Japan has done this in the case of China, and I regret it, of course, as do other people: She has forced upon China virtually certain treaties, but as far as I know she has kept them. As to a treaty with Korea, she finally took Korea as an act of war, and she occupies it under the compulsion of no treaty.

I do not approve of the Shantung proviso in the treaty, and I will venture to say that the President of the United States did not. I have never heard him say. I will venture to say that none of our commissioners did, but I will further venture to say that if you had been a member of the commission, and you, and you, and you, and I, and we had come up against this claim of Japan, buttressed by these three treaties and one understanding—first with China and then with Great Britain, and then with France, and then with Italy—we would have regarded it as a rock wall too high to climb and too thick to butt through, and unless we had wanted to leave the peace conference ourselves and make a separate treaty with Germany—in itself an act of bad faith—there was nothing to do but to surrender the point. We could not have everything our own way.

A friend wrote me the other day about this question. I told him he reminded me a little of one of my daughters once. She had straight hair, and another of the little girls had curly hair. The little straight-haired one was a little envious of the curly-haired one. One day the curly-haired girl was complaining of some hardship of some sort, fancied, of course, and the other one turned to her and said, "Well, you can't have everything and curly hair." [Laughter.] We could not expect to go to Paris and get everything. Great Britain is a sovereign power, and had a right to make a treaty with Japan. France is a sovereign power, and had a right to make a treaty with Japan.

Even in our discussion of the question of Fiume we have based ourselves upon the fact that the treaty of London between Italy and Great Britain especially reserved Fiume from Italian sovereignty. The league of nations goes as far as it can in that direction. It says all treaties entered into antagonistic to the provisions of the league are canceled and set aside. That is virtually what it means; I am not quoting the language. That is as far as it could go.

Now, Mr. President, let us take up the conditions facing us at Paris and see just where we were. A great war had just taken place. Some twelve millions of human beings had been killed or were stricken with death. A score of millions had been crippled. Billions of money had been poured out like water. The world and its industries were mortgaged for two generations to come, or, if not two, at least one. The thing that the world was yearning for was peace. It was not nearly so anxious for exactly the right sort of peace in every provision and every article as it was for peace itself. The British soldiers were begging to be demobilized and carried home. The American soldiers were almost in mutiny, so anxiously were they begging to be carried back to the United States at once. All this was under the theory that the German Army was "whipped," which it never was. It was defeated, but it never was routed up to the very end. All of it alive was there. Were we going to meet at Paris and quarrel with one another? The great danger was that that might take place in this case which took place in the Balkans when the Balkan league, after whipping Turkey, went to war among its own members. The danger was after victory had been won that we should quarrel and fight with one another and inaugurate a new war more destructive than the old one. The President did the best he could; our commissioners did the best they could; and to set aside a great instrument or to endanger it, or to endanger its successful working out in a peaceful way without renewed war, just because you do not like one provision here and another provision there, strikes me as being foolish—to use ultracharitable language.

Suppose we struck out the Shantung provision here? Suppose Japan then said, "All right, strike us, too, and tie things up." What are we going to do? What could we do? Put all the Navy in the Pacific Ocean, put all our soldiers on our ships again and go to China and take Shantung away from Japan? She is not going to give it up except by war. Do we want our boys sent to Asia to whip Japan out of Shantung, when there are 400,000,000 of Chinamen who ought to do their own fighting in their own cause? Why are Senators so loud-voiced about turning over Germany's stealage from China to Japan, when they raised not a voice about the original German stealage? Is it because they thought Germany would take in her heyday of power "no back talk"? Japan served notice at Paris that she would retire from the conference after she had been defeated upon the other propositions if she were defeated on this. Then she and all of us effected an agreement, and the agreement is sacred, whether we feel like it or not, whether I like it or not. I do not like it. There are other provisions in the treaty that I do not like.

I want to say in conclusion that Japan is doing one of the most dangerous things in the world for herself and the world, unless she keeps faith and fulfills the articles of this treaty or, rather, performs the requirement of the treaty of 1915 with China. She is running the risk of treading upon 400,000,000 people with her little 36,000,000 until, like the worm, they rise, until she arouses the sleeping giant or the sleeping dog, as she probably would prefer to phrase it. She is treading the path of danger in doing that. She is giving those 400,000,000 transportation facilities, she is undertaking to train Chinese soldiers, and the Mongolian can invade Europe again, as he did under Genghis Khan, if he so wills. Japan is doing a dangerous thing. The whole world had better let China alone and not teach her warfare. The way to teach her war is to keep oppressing her and making her angry with "foreign devils" of every description, until she has soldiers trained by German or other officers. There is an abundance of officers without jobs now. Then, about 40 or 50 years from now, Japan may find out that instead of her conquering China she has taught China to organize and wield the power to throw Japan into the Pacific Ocean.

I believe Japan is going to keep faith. If I had any suspicion to the contrary, I would not utter it now. If I had an agreement with the Senator from North Carolina, or if there were an agreement between him and the Senator from Colorado, a sacred agreement, and I even suspected that one or the other might not keep it, I would keep my mouth shut until I found out whether he was going to do it or not, unless I wanted to be insulting. The Senate does not want to insult friendly powers.

We are getting to do that too much. We pass all sorts of resolutions of every description here, whenever we feel like it, just as if we were a debating club and our official resolutions did not amount to anything except our individual views. This sort of speeches and these resolutions on the floor of the Senate are, in a way, official, and go to these other countries as official utterances, and wound and hurt and make enemies unnecessarily.

Mr. President, I never saw a Democratic platform with every plank of which I agreed. I never expect to see one unless you just let me draw it up [laughter]; and if you let me draw it up in toto it might be that in three or four days I would find I was mistaken about one or the other of the planks in it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that perhaps the attitude of many of the opponents of the league is due to the fact that they did not draw it up themselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, there is no doubt about that. A great deal of feeling is due to that, at least.

Mr. BORAH. That can not apply to some of us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, the Senator from Arizona said some only. He did not mean everybody nor did he name anyone particularly. But there was a great deal of complaint in the newspapers that "Senators were not sent over," a few of them, to help draw up the entire thing, the idea being that if they could have drawn it up, it would be better, I suppose. I venture to say there are not three men on the other side of the Chamber who would have agreed on the terms of a covenant of the league of nations. I know several who would not have agreed to any sort of a league of nations, and, by the way, I have respect for the honesty and sincerity of their opinions. I can understand that. I can understand a man not wanting any sort of an alliance of any description or any sort of a covenant of peace or anything else on the theory that it might "entangle" us; but I confess I can not understand the man who says he does want a league of peace and then quarrels with every little provision in this one—almost every "t" and "i."

First, it was said the Monroe doctrine was not safe, and then Wilson told us he thought it extended the Monroe doctrine to the world, but he thought maybe he could get it recognized by name. Then he went over there and had it excluded eo nomine, and because it was called a "regional understanding, like the Monroe doctrine," naming "the Monroe doctrine" in so many words, these critics who did not write it deny that the provision of exclusion applies to the Monroe doctrine at all, because they say it is not properly defined as a regional understanding. It is named, and that is better, is it not? Suppose I excepted from my remarks "all black-haired men, like the Senator from Idaho."

Would the fact that his hair has a tinge of auburn keep him from being accepted as the party meant and named?

By the way, it is a regional understanding. The region happens to be the region constituting the United States and all South and Central America and the West Indian Islands, but it is "regional" all the same. It is also described as "calculated to keep the peace." It not only was "calculated to keep the peace," but it has kept it in America, as far as Europe is concerned, for 100 years now, except once when France invaded Mexico, or it will be 100 years in 1923.

Even that did not satisfy these super-hyper-critics. They then said, "Oh, well, you must give us a chance to withdraw from this thing." The President said every sovereign power had the right to withdraw upon proper notice from any sort of a treaty, of course. But he went over and got the withdrawal written in, coupled necessarily with the idea that the withdrawing nation must "fulfill any obligations" already entered into, whatever they were. Then they quarrel about that just as much as they did before.

Then the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] said it surrenders us to "the niggers," and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] says it surrenders us to the Pope! Then there was expressed the idea that we would be forced by it to help Great Britain conquer Ireland if Ireland should ever revolt, and when we point to that part of the treaty which shows to the contrary, because it refers only to external aggression and not to any internal troubles of any description, an Irish friend of mine says, "Yes; that may be so, but while you can not interfere on England's part you can not interfere on Ireland's part either." In other words, we are wanted to help fight to redress Ireland's wrongs—to "pull her chestnuts out of the fire"—at the expense of our treasure and blood. So they make the ground of objection that the league makes us help England conquer Ireland, and then they go to the second ground and say they object because under the league we can not help Ireland conquer England. I do not know that we want to do either. I have no boys to spare for their mutually disgraceful squabble.

Mr. President, I confess I am prejudiced, because it did not take this war to awake my conscience and my mind to the necessity of some covenant of peace amongst the nations, some instrumentality of some sort whereby arbitration could enter into play instead of cannon. For 20 years before this war began I have been in favor of a league of nations to keep the peace of the world if it could be constructed. Unfortunately, it took 12,000,000 lives and 20,000,000 limbs, and I do not know how many billions of dollars to make a whole lot of other people see it. Unfortunately, now, even all of them can not see it unless each can draw up the league for himself. Each fellow is in favor of a league except the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], who are just as honestly opposed to all of it; but pretty nearly all the balance are in favor of a league, if you will let them draw it all up.

Five of the principal nations of the world at war, and a score more nominally in the war, after long travail, agree, and then a United States Senator or two, that none of them ever heard of, representing in ninety-sixth part one branch of one of the nations, wants to draw up a league to suit himself, and says, "Unless you have it virtually just to suit me I will not vote for it." One Senator said he had no objection except to this one provision about Shantung, and that was so awfully wrong in his opinion that he would not vote for it. I have forgotten what strong expression it was that he used, but unless something took place which never could happen he would not vote for it.

I repeat, "You can not have everything and curly hair."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are indebted to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] for stating frankly and quite clearly why Shantung was given over to Japan.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator, of course, understands I just state that as my inference. I have no intimate knowledge.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I understand the Senator was speaking for himself, but at the same time I know the close relationship of the Senator to other people.

The Senator from Mississippi has stated frankly the real reason for giving Shantung to Japan. It may just as well be accepted as the reason without any circumlocution or uncertainty of argument or bad logic. It is because Japan refused to become a party to the treaty—either the treaty or the league—unless she had Shantung. After you have searched all the evidence and traveled over the entire field of facts and searched all the records of the peace conference, Senator WILLIAMS will be found to be correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, if the Senator will pardon me, Great Britain and France supported her in it, because they had made treaties with her.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; Great Britain and France also have a part of China. Anyone who has studied the situation in the Far East knows that the delivery of Shantung to Japan is a very small item in the tremendous program which has been outlined for the dismemberment of the Chinese Republic. It is quite correct, therefore, to say that Japan demanded Shantung, and that she refused to sign the treaty or to be a member of the league of nations unless she received it, and it is quite correct to say also that Great Britain and France supported Japan in the demand. It is equally correct to say that the President of the United States could do nothing else than give Shantung to Japan if he desired to have the treaty of peace signed and the league of nations accepted. I agree with both those propositions.

I do not criticize the President if he conceived the signing of the treaty was of more importance to the future happiness and tranquillity of the people of the world than the distribution of the Chinese Empire among these several powers. I do not criticize him for taking that course. It was a matter of judgment. But let us not here undertake to camouflage the facts. The Senator from Mississippi has stated them just as they are, and the question with reference to Shantung is whether or not the United States will become a party to the transaction. Either Cæsar or nothing.

Mr. President, every Government which sat at that council table when Shantung was bartered to Japan was under a solemn treaty or agreement to respect the territorial integrity of China. The United States had had a treaty or agreement for years with China to respect her territorial integrity. France had a treaty with China to protect her territorial integrity, which was in force and in operation at the time that she sat at the peace conference. Great Britain had a treaty to protect the territorial integrity of China, and every nation which helped to distribute Shantung to Japan and initiate the dismemberment of the Chinese Republic had a solemn agreement or treaty with China to respect or protect her territorial integrity. These treaties or agreements were ignored. Honor and common honesty were ignored, because Japan threatened, and Great Britain and France for selfish reasons supported Japan. It is too true that this treaty could not go through until China was virtually divided. It is perhaps true the President had to consent. But I object to calling it a new charter of civilization. It is the old imperialistic system in its most revolting aspect.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator give the date of the treaty to which he refers?

Mr. BORAH. I can not do it now. I thought I had it here, but I have not. I will put it in the RECORD later or a reference to it, so it may be easily identified.

Mr. THOMAS. Was it prior to the acquisition by Germany of the Shantung territory?

Mr. BORAH. I could not state as to the date. But take the Root-Takahira agreement—I have forgotten the date of it, but the Senator will recall the first paragraph of it was that the United States and Japan would respect the territorial integrity of China.

Mr. THOMAS. That being the case, did not that duty shift to the United States when Germany seized Shantung?

Mr. BORAH. I think that is probably true.

Mr. THOMAS. We acquiesced in it at that time and also failed to do our duty, and in that the Senator is correct.

Mr. BORAH. I am not forgiving that feature of it at all; two wrongs do not make a right. We are here disposing of the proposition as it was taken up and settled at Versailles.

Mr. THOMAS. The thought I had in mind, if the Senator will permit me, is that if we and the other nations having this treaty had acquiesced in the seizure, because that is what it was, of Kiaochow and Shantung at the time the conference met in Paris we by our action recognized German sovereignty in that particular section of China; and that being the case, it could not be considered because of our own acquiescence in a wrong as to Chinese territory at that time.

Mr. BORAH. At the time the Versailles conference convened Germany had no territorial rights whatever in China.

Mr. THOMAS. Because Japan had taken it from her by force of arms.

Mr. BORAH. First in importance, because when China declared war on Germany all Germany's rights were at an end. And while Japan had taken Germany's rights by force of arms, in the ultimatum which Japan issued to Germany she included and incorporated in the ultimatum a promise to restore them to China.

Mr. THOMAS. That is entirely true, and that was followed by the treaty of May, 1915, prescribing the terms under which the transfer was made.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; it was followed by the treaty of 1915; and everyone knows that the treaty of 1915 was secured by force and under the protest not only of China but virtually under the protest of the United States——

Mr. THOMAS. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. The United States asked Japan officially if it was her intention to retain the Chinese territory, and Japan asserted that it was not.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true; but the fact that the treaty was extorted by force does not do away with the legality of the treaty. If so, then half the treaties of the world are scraps of paper.

Mr. BORAH. Then why did we restore Alsace and Lorraine to France? The Senator also leaves out one important item in that proposition. The first treaty with Germany was extorted by force. It was founded in immorality and injustice. Japan succeeded by force to the rights of Germany. China declared war upon Germany. That terminated the treaty between China and Germany. Japan had no other right than the right of possession of the property of a friendly power or an ally.

Mr. THOMAS. But she had acquired it by force of arms before China declared war against Germany?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so; but she could not acquire anything except what Germany had, and what Germany had ended when China declared war against her.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That principle does not apply when possession of territory changes.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes, it does. There is no difference whatever in the two propositions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BORAH. In international law the very moment that Germany's rights ended by reason of the declaration of war, that moment no one could acquire anything by virtue of having taken possession of Germany's rights.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No one could acquire anything in virtue of the German treaty after that took place, but they might acquire something in virtue of war intervening between the time when the treaty was valid and the time when Germany entered into war.

Mr. BORAH. Let us see about that. Germany acquires her rights in the first instance by force and by fraud. China signs the German treaty under duress. There comes a time when we want to eliminate Germany from China. Japan, the United States, Great Britain, and France are all interested in eliminating Germany from China, and China is an ally, also, and we go in and take possession of the property of a friendly power. Later that friendly power terminates the rights of Germany by entering the war against her. What possible right, either in international or municipal law, or in morals or justice, could Japan possibly acquire by having taken possession from Germany of that which Germany acquired by force and that which China afterwards terminated by entering the war against Germany?

Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi had better stand by his original proposition, and that is that there was no right upon which to found the demand of Japan. It was simply the fact that Japan required this as a prerequisite to her entering the league.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not in the league, but in signing the treaty of peace.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, or anything else in the league.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not in the league, but in signing the treaty of peace.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Under the argument of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] if Japan fell heir to the German rights by virtue of her conquest of Shantung, conquest by arms, why did Japan approach Great Britain on February 16, 1917——

Mr. WILLIAMS. "To make assurance doubly sure."

Mr. FALL. The Senator's mind works as quickly as usual. And the French ambassador on February 19, and ask them to enter into a secret agreement, a suppressed agreement only recently exposed, and to agree that Japan might at the peace table receive their support in the retention of the Shantung Peninsula.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, and——

Mr. THOMAS. I understood that question to be directed to me.

Mr. BORAH. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. And also Japan demanded the signing of this treaty as a prerequisite for her consent to permit China to enter the war at all. I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Mississippi has suggested to me that I should answer that she did it because she wanted to make assurance doubly sure, and I think there is much in that. I believe, however, that there is no obstacle or objection to any country attempting to secure that which she has by the suggestion of treaties with other countries with whom she is at that time in alliance. Japan declared war very largely because she was a party to a treaty of alliance with Great Britain, and under the terms of that treaty, with which I am not at all familiar, it may be that she was required to do so or felt it safe to do so, since otherwise some common claims to the property might be advanced by her ally, Great Britain. That, however, is a conjecture.

If the Senator will permit me to add one other observation, I do not think the fact that Japan did make these overtures or sign the treaty thereafter has anything to do with the main proposition, which is, if two nations by a treaty, whether acquired by force or otherwise, so change their boundaries that one obtains possession of a part of the territory of the other which it loses to a warring power, after which the despoiled country declares war against the despoiler, the declaration of war at that time serves eo ipso to restore conditions as they were prior to the original arrangement.

Mr. FALL. We are trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Idaho, but if he will allow me a moment, I think we need not fall into the realms of conjecture to ascertain the purposes or the acts of these nations at this time, because we have the words, the demands, and the reason for the demands given in the exposition of these secret negotiations. If the Senator will allow me, in the approach made to the French ambassador at Tokyo on February 19, Viscount Motoro said——

Mr. THOMAS. Was that February 19 of this year?

Mr. FALL. On February 19, 1917, the Japanese minister of foreign affairs said:

> The Imperial Japanese Government has not yet formally entered into conversations with the Entente powers concerning the conditions of peace I propose to present to Germany, because it is guided by the thought that such questions ought to be decided in concert between Japan and the said powers at the moment when the peace negotiations begin. Nevertheless, in view of recent developments in the general situation, and in view of the particular arrangements concerning peace conditions, such as arrangements relative to the disposition of the Bosporus, Constantinople, and the Dardanelles, being already under discussion by the powers interested, the Imperial Japanese Government believes that the moment has come for it also to express its desires relative to certain conditions of peace essential to Japan and to submit them for the consideration of the Government of the French Republic.
> The French Government is thoroughly informed of all the efforts the Japanese Government has made in a general manner to accomplish its task in the present war, and particularly to guaranty for the future the peace of Oriental Asia and the security of the Japanese Empire, for which it is absolutely necessary to take from Germany its bases of political, military, and economic activity in the Far East.
> Under these conditions the Imperial Japanese Government proposes to demand from Germany at the time of the peace negotiations the surrender of the territorial rights and special interests Germany possessed before the war in Shantung and the islands situated north of the equator in the Pacific Ocean.
> The Imperial Japanese Government confidently hopes the Government of the French Republic, realizing the legitimacy of these demands, will give assurance that, her case being proved, Japan may count upon its full support on this question.

And it was in similar language that Japan approached Great Britain. I will not take the time of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to read the replies of both those great Governments to this demand or suggestion, or whatever you choose to call it, of Japan as to what she proposed to demand at the peace table. It is only necessary to say that she received immediate private assurance from Great Britain and from France that her demand would be heeded.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, no man does credit to his intellectual integrity who undertakes to justify Japan's legal right to Shantung. She had no legal right. The able Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] says that possibly some obligation rested upon Japan and Great Britain growing out of the Anglo-Japanese treaty and that because Japan entered the war at the suggestion of Great Britain there was some obligation arising by reason of that fact.

Mr. THOMAS. That is merely conjecture.

Mr. BORAH. But that really is not entitled, with all due respect to the able Senator, to be a matter of conjecture, for the reason that both Great Britain and Japan have officially stated that Japan did not enter the war by reason of the Anglo-Japanese agreement or treaty; and Viscount Ishii, in his Fourth of July speech at Boston, said that there was no obligation under the Anglo-Japanese treaty that Japan should enter the war; that it related alone to matters which were not covered by the situation as it then existed, and that Great Britain did not request that Japan enter the war.

Not only that, Mr. President, but Great Britain was rather desirous at that time that she should be permitted to take possession of the German possessions rather than for Japan to do so, and Japan entered the war wholly for another reason. Japan entered the war for the purpose of obtaining those possessions. The evidence, both circumstantial and direct, is conclusive upon that proposition. She entered the war for that purpose; and when she had secured those possessions her activities in the war practically ceased. She devoted her entire ability and her transcendant ingenuity to securing ultimate and final possession, when she came to the peace table, of those things which she had taken possession of by virtue of war. So, Mr. President, I repeat that the able Senator from Mississippi has stated the whole thing—that there was no treaty obligation which was binding. There was no obligation other than the fact that Japan held the key to the situation.

No nation has ever played its diplomatic game with greater ingenuity and greater ability and greater foresight than did Japan at Versailles. In the first place, she put out her racial equality demand, which she never expected to receive and did not care anything particularly about; but it was the thing upon which she placed her first demand. Then, when the second situation arose with reference to her possessions in China, she was in a position to say: "We will not submit to being rejected or refused twice upon matters which are of vital concern to us."

It not only means that she is in possession of Shantung, but it means that she now controls the three great gateways to China. She is in control of the Manchurian Railway gateway into China; she is in control of the Shantung gateway; and she holds the Formosa Island, which commands the situation with reference to the other and third great gateway into China.

This means, as every student of eastern affairs frankly says it means, the dismemberment of China. It means not alone the possession for the time of Shantung, the transference of from thirty to forty million of people to the domination of an alien enemy, but it means the rupture and breaking up of the Chinese Republic and the Chinese nation. But it means war before the fearful crime is consummated. And article 10 binds us to take part in the war, for when China undertakes to get back her stolen territory and to get back her bartered peoples it will be an application of external territorial aggression.

The Senator from Mississippi asks, What will we do about it? Shall we refuse to recognize the demand of Japan? If so, says the Senator, shall we transfer our fleet to the Pacific Ocean and stand ready for war? I do not think that any such outlook as that need be entertained. I do not anticipate that because we ourselves refuse to underwrite the rape of Shantung we shall be challenged to war. But, Mr. President, let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that something of that kind stares us in the face, then I beg you to contemplate the position we occupy to-day in this entangling alliance affair, that the United States, for the first time in its history, must underwrite the slavery and the oppression of 40,000,000 of people under threat. We have stood for 150 years with a clean record, but now we are told that we must have war if we do not underwrite and perpetuate the transfer of 38,000,000 of human souls to an alien power. That is the thing that is put up to us by the Senator from Mississippi.

I do not think that Japan would go to war unless we underwrite this. She would likely be perfectly satisfied with her treaty with France and with Great Britain. That is their business; that is their doorstep which they may clean or leave unclean as they prefer. I do not presume that Japan expected us to perpetuate for all time that which we have now agreed to do.

But, Mr. President, if the time has come when the United States must engage in enslaving people and in establishing machinery by which they shall be kept in oppression, if the time has come when the United States must consent to the dismemberment of a great nation and to the breaking up and scattering of 400,000,000 people, if the time has come when we must violate our solemn treaties which we have with China to respect her territorial integrity, or face the challenge of another power, we will face the challenge of another power. Whatever else happens we will not sacrifice our honor. We do not anticipate war with Japan; but one thing the American people will never submit to when the facts are known—they will never remain a party to a treaty which has the effect of oppressing millions upon millions of people. We may not draw out now; but when the facts are revealed from time to time, as the debate and consideration goes on, as it will go on for weeks and months, when the true import of this transaction is known, the American people will refuse to break up and dismember the Chinese nation. I say, therefore, Mr. President, while I do not anticipate and certainly do not want trouble with Japan, we will still have the courage to do the honorable thing.

I desire to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor, of Boston, published July 7, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

AUT CÆSAR AUT NULLUS.

If the action of the peace conference in respect to China had been actuated by principle, there would be no more to be said in the matter. Neither the protests of Chinese statesmen nor the invective of atrabilious critics could have had any more effect than the barking of dogs. As it is, the efforts of the great powers to justify their action and to persuade Peking to be "reasonable" are absolutely predestined to failure. To begin with, supposing that the ratifying bodies of all the powers, great or small, agree to whitewash the peace conference by accepting its decision, is there one of them which is foolish enough to imagine that this will affect principle? A greater philosopher by far than any of those who sat round the peace table wrote to certain little churches in Galatia, far more insignificant in the full tide of Roman pride and insolence than the powers of to-day can pretend that China is to them, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

Principle, in other words, is irrefragably principle. And though all the powers in the world say that two and two make five, their sum total is, and will remain, exactly four. Nor it is scarcely necessary to say, will this be altered in any way should China itself be induced to become "reasonable," and to admit that the handing over of 36,000,000 of people to an alien power, with no questions asked, is self-determination. Two and two, in short, will remain four even if the fact be misstated thirty-six millions of times. So far no reason has been produced for the great or minor powers casting themselves for the rôle of Blueskin to Japan's Jack Sheppard other than the fact that Jack Sheppard's presence is much desired in the league of nations. If this be the fact, it can only be said that the league of nations must be in a parlous condition. When the bishop, in the story, dined, somewhat perforce and by reason of the cold and a great hunger, with the highwayman, in the inn by the Great North Road, it may be remembered that he tucked up his apron, so that that symbol of his virtue should not be too aggressively apparent to the innkeeper. It is to be imagined that the great powers, and the minor for that matter, are somewhat busily engaged in these days in tucking out of sight any dispensable emblems of a too arrogant morality when the word "China" is mentioned.

To the plain man, ungifted with the political conscience, for the quality of statesmanship may be summarily dismissed from the present hearing, it is almost impossible to comprehend how the peace conference succeeded in persuading itself that the wrong done to China in Shantung could be worth any right gained from Japan in the league of nations or elsewhere. It will be remembered that when, in the ducal court in Venice, Bassanio pleaded with the "young doctor of Rome," by name Balthasar, that he should "To do a great right, do a little wrong," that second Daniel swept away the Jesuitism of the suggestion with the words—

"'Twill be recorded for a precedent,
And many an error, by the same example,
Will rush into the state: it can not be."

It was, of course, not Balthasar, not Portia, who was speaking in those lines, but the great poet-philosopher of Elizabethan England. He saw clearly enough where playing politics with principle headed for, and it is wonderful that the peace council, with three centuries in which to learn wisdom, and better the example, were at the end of that time simply left tucking up their aprons.

This Shantung affair, then, is manifestly, whether politically or not, one of those matters which, with all respect to Mister Shandy, Tristram of that ilk, they do not order better in France. There is obviously no hope to be sought in Paris, and equally so none to be discovered in London, tied up as Downing Street is in a nefarious bargain with France and Japan. So it is to the Senate of the United States that the eyes of the world are turning, and on the Senate lies the burden of a great responsibility. It is being asked with the dulcet pleading of Bassanio to do a little wrong in order to accomplish a great right. But, in the first place, is it quite certain that the arbitrary disposal of the rights of 36,000,000 of people, and "also much cattle," is such a little wrong? And, in the second place, is it proven that the inclusion of Japan in the league of nations is so mighty a right, after all? On whom exactly would disaster have fallen if Japan had decided to remain outside the league?

The truth of the matter is that, at the great card party in Paris, so far as can be judged—for the game was played with the cards anywhere but on the table—Japan risked a simply tremendous bluff and never had it called. It is quite true that the Japanese delegates were aware that, owing to existing treaty arrangements, they had France and the British Commonwealth in the pockets of their kimonos, if kimonos have such things. It is also true that they were aware that the attention of Italy was focused on Fiume, and that the delegates from Rome were murmuring only that and nothing else, always excepting, of course, everything that had gone before. So that it comes to this—if anyone is going to stand between Japan and its prey, if anyone is going to forbid the rape of Shantung, it will be aut Senatus aut nullus—the Senate or nobody. Can anybody see any difference between the rape of Belgium and the rape of Shantung except this, that in the one case the British Commonwealth and France urged Belgium to stand firm, and they would come to her assistance, while in the other case those great powers became participators in the crime.

What, then, is the Senate going to do? It depends, surely, whether it decides to view the question from the point of view of statesmanship or politics. Politics will urge it to ratify, and have done with a troublesome business. Statesmanship will compel it to face the vast range of probabilities and problems which lie behind a too easy acceptance, to examine them, and to insist on the reopening of the question. The future, not the mere immediate political future of the United States but of world diplomacy and good faith among nations, lies in the decision. "I claim," said Abraham Lincoln once, "not to have controlled events but confess plainly that events have controlled me."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] yesterday made what was called a keynote speech with reference to the league. I presume it was made in a measure authoritatively. The Senator did not say so, but the presumption is it was a speech which had the approval of those who are most interested in the league. I want to read a paragraph from that speech and then to ask the friends who are supporting this league if they understand this to be its correct interpretation. The Senator from Virginia said:

Article 1 has the following provision:

"Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal."

The requirement of two years' notice is reasonable, as no member should be permitted suddenly to terminate so important an engagement. Neither would it be just for a member to escape its accrued international and covenant obligations by withdrawing. Members that receive the benefits of the league should also bear its burdens. Especially would the United States scorn to avail herself of the privilege of retiring from the league without fully and honorably discharging every obligation. The contention that the United States could not withdraw without the unanimous consent of the council or assembly, the only bodies that can act for the league, is wholly untenable. No power whatever is conferred upon either of these bodies to act upon this question; no authority is given anywhere to compel the retention of a member after giving the required notice of withdrawal.

There is only one construction to be placed upon that language; in fact, it is too plain to call for construction. The clear import of the language is that a nation may withdraw upon its own motion by the simple act of giving notice; and that whether or not it has performed its international obligations or its obligations to the league is a matter to be determined by the nation itself which is seeking to withdraw. Is that the construction placed upon this clause by the advocates of the league? Is it understood here and now that the United States may after it enters this league—if it does—give its notice and at the end of two years may withdraw, whether the other members of the league or the council or the assembly are satisfied with the withdrawal or not? If that is the construction which is to be placed upon this proposition, then one course may be pursued here with reference to amendments. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he understands that the United States has a right to withdraw from the league upon the simple fact of giving notice, and that no other member of the league can object that the United States has not complied with or has not fulfilled its international obligations or its covenant obligations?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose the question as to whether the United States in such a case had fulfilled its international obligations would be, in the first place, a question which would present itself to the conscience of the United States. I suppose, in the second place, if the other nations which are members of the league differ from the United States about that, they would express their difference.

Mr. BORAH. If they did object, could the United States still withdraw? Would it have a right under the covenant to withdraw?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The United States could physically remain absent, but it would be subject to the obligations which it had incurred to the league, whatever the league decided they were——

Mr. BORAH. Oh, precisely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. After the United States had put its interpretation upon them. I will say further that I can not imagine a case in which the United States would withdraw if the United States thought there was any obligation resting upon it——

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so; but can the United States be the sole judge?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or if the league thought there were any obligations resting upon the United States.

Mr. BORAH. What I desire to know is: Has the United States a right under the league covenant to interpret its own right to withdraw, and, if the United States says that it has performed its international obligations and has performed its covenant obligations, has any member of the council the right to say "nay"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not any member alone; but the league, by unanimous vote of all the other powers—I am not an expert judge, the Senator understands—might, I should say, if I were going to construe it, say, "We do not think that the United States has complied with its obligation, whatever it is," and then the question would come before the league to be decided.

Mr. BORAH. And if the league decides that we have not fulfilled our international obligations?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then we would be theoretically and technically a member of the league, though we might be absent physically, until we did comply with the obligations.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, of course, you can not take away the right of revolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say, if the Senator will pardon me, you can not enter into any agreement where there are obligations on the part of other people to you and to the body of which you are a member without your having obligations to that body also. That goes without saying; it is common sense.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I supposed until I heard the Senator from Virginia make the address to which I have referred and to which I wish to call the Senator's attention, for he says:

The contention that the United States could not withdraw without the unanimous consent of the council or assembly, the only bodies that can act for the league, is wholly untenable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; that is untenable. That is not the statement the Senator made or the one I made. I said that the United States could not be retained except by the unanimous consent of the league.

Mr. BORAH. Well, if the United States seeks to withdraw, then it takes the unanimous consent of the council——

Mr. WILLIAMS. To keep it there.

Mr. BORAH. To keep it there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Even technically and theoretically; but I wish to add that practically, if they wanted to keep the United States in the league and we had determined that we had complied with every obligation and would not stay, they would have but one way of compelling us, and that would be to make war upon us, which is absolutely inconceivable.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I do not know. The ex-President of the United States, Mr. Taft, in New York sometime ago, when asked whether the United States if it entered this league could withdraw, said in reply, "You know what experience the Southern States had."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think there is a vast difference between a constitution which makes a Federal State and a constitution which makes a confederacy for certain purposes, just as much as there was between the old Government under the Continental Congress and the Government which was framed under the new Constitution. There was some grounds—and I believe that even the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will agree with me about this—for the South's contention that she had a technical constitutional or legal right to withdraw even from a Federal State like this. A fortiori could there be any dispute at all about the right to withdraw from a mere league like this? Nobody is calling this a Federal State, not even a supergovernment; it is a mere league of nations. It was what Calhoun contended the United States was.

Mr. BORAH. Then, as I understand the position of the Senator, it is that, being a mere league of nations, the United States may withdraw whenever it gets ready to give notice, and that nobody can object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, I did not say that.

Mr. BORAH. I mean nobody can legally object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that; I said they could legally and technically object; that they could say, "Here is an obligation of the United States not complied with, and therefore she ought not to withdraw." Then the United States might reconsider her position, and she would determine either that she would or that she would not. She might say, "Very well; that is true; I will fulfill that obligation, and that will make my connection with the league terminate," or she might say, "I contend that I have fulfilled the obligation, and I will not go back into the league."

Mr. BORAH. Well, that is revolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then there will be no way left except for the league, by unanimous vote, to undertake to coerce her.

Mr. BORAH. Then I ask the Senator this question: Has the council or the assembly any power whatever to pass upon the question of the right of a country to withdraw?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should think so, reasoning from mere common sense.

Mr. BORAH. I had thought so, too.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The sole right that they have in that respect is to determine whether there is any existing outstanding obligation; that is all.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Virginia says that no power whatever is conferred upon either of these bodies, to wit, the council or the assembly, upon this question of withdrawal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not help that. If I were to quote all the various assertions made upon the other side in opposition, so variant with one another and so far apart from one another, you might set them against one another and cancel them off; but I do not think you can cancel a right interpretation of an instrument by quoting some other interpretation. I do not contend that my interpretation is necessarily right; I am no judge. That would be a rather judicial function.

Mr. BORAH. I insist that we go back to our late leader, and get the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to give his construction of it, because those of us who are seeking to find out what this means are entitled to know from those who are advocating its adoption what the construction is which they, as advocates of its adoption, place upon this important proposition. There is not any more important clause in the league covenant than the right of withdrawal. If the Senator from Virginia be correct that neither the council nor the assembly has any power whatever to pass upon this question, this debate, of course, will take an entirely different turn upon that proposition; and if anybody knows, including the President or Mr. Lansing, what construction was placed upon it by the conference itself, we are entitled have that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Undoubtedly, and by the way, Mr. President, if it had been necessary in framing the Constitution of the United States to frame it so that there could never be a lawsuit over its different provisions, our ancestors made some grave mistakes. I do not know how many lawsuits have grown out of the interpretation of the various clauses of the Constitution. I read once that there had been 134 law cases growing out of one clause alone. I do not know whether or not that is true; but that does not militate against the desirability of trying to do a thing. The human language is as weak as a human being; nobody yet was ever able to frame an instrument of any sort whose interpretation could not be disputed.

Mr. BORAH. I do not contend that at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My interpretation is worth about as little as that of anybody you could ask, I reckon.

Mr. BORAH. I would not say that; I think the Senator has very great ability in the construction of legislative proposals, and I think the Senator from Virginia has also. Therefore I am utterly bewildered to know how I shall get out of this league if I get in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You will have to get in before you can get out.

Mr. BORAH. I am satisfied it will take longer to get out than it will to get in, it does not make any difference what the construction may be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope so.

Mr. BORAH. But this is the situation: There is no more important article in the covenant than the right of withdrawal. If the right of withdrawal rests alone with the United States, if it can step out whenever it feels that it desires to go out and can step out with honor, having fulfilled its obligations, both legal and moral, according to its judgment, if it is understood by the Versailles conference that the United States can step out whenever it gives notice, that is one thing and it is a very important thing; but if, on the other hand, the council or the assembly has a right to pass upon the question and it takes unanimous consent to agree to our withdrawal, that is a wholly different proposition.

While the Senator says that no instrument can be drawn which will not give rise to dispute at some time in the future, yet we are here making this instrument, we are still writing this instrument, for we are a part of the treaty-making power; and if we assent to an instrument and ask our people to enter into an obligation which we ourselves do not understand and which we confess we do not understand in a matter of such tremendous moment to them—if we do that, shall be have performed our duty in the writing of the treaty upon which the peace of the world is to rest in the future?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, my answer to that would be twofold. In the first place, we are not all of the treaty-making power; we are a part of the treaty-making power of one nation. All of the nations have to agree to the treaty. That is the reply to that. Now, I reply——

Mr. BORAH. It is not a reply, because, while we are only one member, we represent ourselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the Senator. The Senate has a right to amend; but it has got to go back and get the consent of the others.

As to the other proposition, the Senator says it is something that we do not understand ourselves. In my profession of humility about not being a judge, I am not confessing that I do not understand it. I understand it; I put my construction upon it, and it is very clear to me; but whether it be right or not is a matter for other intellects to struggle with as well as mine.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, we seem to have arrived at a point where there is a disagreement between the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Virginia as to this——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That seems to be true, from what the Senator has read from the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BORAH. Because the Senator from Virginia says:

> The contention that the United States could not withdraw without the unanimous consent of the council or assembly, the only bodies that can act for the league, is wholly untenable. No power whatever is conferred upon either of these bodies to act upon this question; no authority is given anywhere to compel the retention of a member after giving the required notice of withdrawal.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Awhile ago in the Senator's remarks he referred to treaties with China, which he asserted committed us to the proposal that we should protect the territorial integrity of the Chinese Empire. Did I understand the Senator to say that he is going to insert a reference to those treaties in his remarks?

Mr. BORAH. I think I can get them in just a moment. I will insert them in my speech if I do not get them; but I will get them in a few moments—will kill time until I do get them.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a copy of a letter written by Mr. Elmer T. Peterson, editor of the Wichita Beacon, to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] with reference to a ballot which was taken in that part of the country on the league of nations. This letter was written in reply to a statement made by the Senator from Nebraska that no reference could be made to any instance in which a vote had been taken or public opinion tested which was not overwhelmingly for the league. I ask to insert this letter and also the form of the ballot.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

JULY 5, 1919.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HITCHCOCK: On page 2067 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 30, 1919, you are quoted as saying, "I challenge the Senator from Idaho to refer me to any test made anywhere to show the state of public opinion on this league that is not favorable to it."

We can very readily cite a most conclusive and convincing test of that kind.

The Beacon conducted a poll, open to anybody, using a ballot, a sample of which is inclosed. The result showed that there were only 37 in favor of the present covenant, while 863 were dissatisfied with it and desired either to amend it or reject it altogether; 457 were wholly against any league. The votes for suggested amendments were:

To protect the Monroe doctrine	299
To safeguard immigration, labor, trade, Panama Canal, etc	406
To guard against sending soldiers to other countries (art. 10)	344
In favor of covenant as it stands	37
Wholly against any league	457

The answers were mostly from farmers and people of small towns. The farmers were most strongly against the league. I still have the letters accompanying the ballots, and they are a revelation, showing a very decided sentiment against the present covenant. I consider this a far more reliable and convincing test of the opinion of the "plain people" than that of the Literary Digest, for instance.

The reason we got this result was because we put the question in a plain, straightforward way, whereas all of the other test votes I have noticed put the question in a manner which gave the league a decided advantage. Of course, 9 people out of 10 would vote for "an organization of nations to promote peace," or something of the kind, but when the covenant stands on its merits and the questions are put straight, as they were in this questionnaire, the sentiment is overwhelmingly against the kind of a project you and some of your colleagues are trying to saddle on the United States, and when the people fully realize what it all means, when all the camouflage and rhetoric is stripped off and the true meaning of articles 10 and 11 and other features is known, you can depend upon it that there will be a tremendous revulsion of feeling against you and those who stand with you on this question.

Senator CAPPER, who has kept an open mind on the league question, writes me that this questionnaire is the best he has seen. Since challenges are in order, I challenge you, as leader of the procovenant forces, to put such a questionnaire before the people of the United States. Undoubtedly you know in your heart that the result would be disastrous for your side of the question.

The trouble is that most of the people have not read the covenant and are taking the word of leaders for certain things. This is a very inconclusive and unsatisfactory state of affairs. The league advocates contradict each other as to what the covenant means. Some of them say it is like our American Constitution, which would, of course, make the league a superstate, while others say it is not a superstate and has no power except to recommend or advise action. And so on. As I understand the situation, all the covenant critics ask is that the people be given an opportunity to study the whole thing carefully upon a set of "interpretations," which can be agreed upon by both sides to the controversy, if such a thing is possible, and then vote. If it is impossible to obtain an interpretation of this kind, let the plain words of the English language stand for what they say.

Would the people of the United States have indorsed President Wilson in guaranteeing the independence and territorial integrity of Serbia in July, 1914, league or no league? They would not. Will they indorse any future President in guaranteeing the independence and territorial integrity of any country in a similar case in the future, league or no league? Let your knowledge of human nature answer.

It is idle to say that "this league" is the only league that is before the American people; in fact, it is a slur at American intelligence. The people of a city may be in favor of giving a street car company a franchise, but they are not going to accept any kind of a franchise that the company may feel like presenting. They want to know what it all means, and they have a perfect right to amend the franchise and strike out certain features. The Beacon contended ever since the armistice that some kind of a league was needed, but this does not mean that we have to support the precise instrument that was handed down from Paris. To say that we must take "this league" or nothing is to deny the American people the right of a voice in their own affairs. I do not need to argue this, for you are so intelligent that you know it without argument.

I inclose a copy of the ballot that we used, showing the total votes on each proposition. If you will read the result into the RECORD, along with the other votes of which you have spoken, it may serve to throw a little light by showing the intelligent discrimination shown by Kansas people.

Very truly, yours,

———— ———,
Associate Editor.

(Copies to Senators BORAH and LODGE.)

LEAGUE OF NATIONS BALLOT.

Put a cross in the square opposite the statement or statements that most nearly express your opinion. Cut out this ballot and mail it to the league poll editor, the Beacon, Wichita, Kans., or drop it in ballot box in the Beacon's business office.

I favor the proposed league of nations constitution as published, without amendment, 37.

I favor a league of nations constitution amended so as to protect the Monroe doctrine in specific language, 299.

I favor a league of nations with constitution amended so as to safeguard American rights in matters of immigration, naturalization, labor, trade, and the Panama Canal, in specific language, 406.

I favor a league of nations with constitution amended specifically so that the United States can not be compelled to send soldiers to foreign countries to settle disputes as to boundaries, etc., 344.

I am wholly opposed to any league of nations, 457.

Name, Oscar Turner; address, Meno, Okla.

Mr. BORAH. I will yield the floor until I find the matter I have sent for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the remarks made by the Senator from Idaho, which would have been humorous to my mind if he had so intended them, and a great many other remarks that have been made in support of various little things about the treaty, call to my mind a piece of exquisite humor that I picked up some time ago, not of the very highest order, but very good, entitled "If the United States Senate debated 'Now I lay me down to sleep,'" by Clark McAdams, in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. I do not know the politics of that paper. Here is the debate that he says would take place in the Senate:

"FIRST SENATOR. I propose that we adopt for the youth of our Republic the following prayer, to be said before going to bed:

"Now I lay me down to sleep.
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take.

"SECOND SENATOR. Mr. President, I protest against obligating the children of this country to any set prayer before they go to bed; but this is a Christian country, something of this sort is understood to be our duty to posterity, and I suppose we therefore must have it. If so, I want to see it given more elasticity. The first line says:

"Now I lay me down to sleep.

"That is unworthy of a free people. It is un-American. Must we lay down to sleep because the law says so, when it may suit the purposes of slumber better to sleep standing up? [Applause.] It is not established that we must lay down to sleep. As a matter of fact, it may be discovered at any moment that a recumbent or prostrate position is exactly that in which we get the least rest. Thousands of soldiers slept standing up in the trenches of France. I am told that most of those men continue to sleep standing up. They find they rest better. Moreover, they do not so completely surrender consciousness sleeping in that way as one does lying down. They wake easier, and their wits are not so sluggish. It is not certain that we should wholly surrender consciousness when we sleep. A good many eminent authorities think not. Certainly the soldier who slept with one eye open, so to speak, did not suffer by that experience. He is the best man among us to-day. Do you know anything about physiology, Mr. President? I am told that physiologically we ought never to sleep as this prayer says we must sleep. It is in an upright position that we are physiologically normal. You know how much trouble we have had with gasoline engines in airplanes because they were not originally suited to running in any save an upright position. They were not properly oiled when they ran on end. They were not properly cooled when they ran upside down. It is the same with us. We are physiologically exactly what we were when we first slept upright in trees and then leaned against the walls of a cave. Did you ever see a horse sleep, Mr. President? A horse almost always sleeps upright. Shall we say, then, that our children must all sleep, as this prayer says they must sleep, or shall we leave them free to sleep as they wish or as science shall discover how they should sleep? [Applause.] I am for the spirit of the prayer, but against the form."

This does not apply to the Senator from Idaho. He is against the form and the spirit also.

"Let us stick to our traditions.
Give us liberty or give us death.
Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said:
'This is my own my native land,
To rest in sleeping or to stand—
As Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
Who went to bed with their trousers on,
All exercised a freeman's voice
In making that historic choice?'
Breathes there a man with soul so dead
The law can stuff him into bed,
And through the long night watches keep
Its cruel vigil o'er his sleep?

"[Laughter and applause.]

"THIRD SENATOR. Mr. President, the third line of this proposed prayer says:

"If I should die before I wake.

"That is absurd. How could one die before one wakes? As well say one died before one lived. It is the duty of the Senate to weigh words and to determine what they mean. We are here positing the impossible, a thing as unworthy of us as a deliberative body as it would be futile of us as givers of law. Are we, in agreeing upon a little prayer which our children may say before they go to bed, to plumb the depths of metaphysics and try abitrarily to establish a fact of life which has resisted every research of science? [Applause.] I can not believe it. Why can not we make this read simply,

"If I should die—

"Which is probably all that would happen, without attempting to say that one dies before waking or involving ourselves in an interminable dispute over a point which has nothing whatever to do with getting our children reverently and sweetly to bed? [Laughter and applause.] Let us not, in freedom's name, undertake to establish in this body, without benefit of anything better than mere political science, that one dies before one wakes, or wakes before one dies, or attempt to say what happens in that hidden moment when the soul sets forth upon the great adventure of death! [Applause.] Let us concern ourselves with things of the state, which is our business, leaving things of the spirit to those trained in things of the spirit and things of the soul to those trained in things of the soul. Let us continue to be merely Republicans and Democrats [laughter], claiming to know only the things known by Republicans and Democrats [laughter], and not attempt to be metaphysicians or anything which everybody outside this Chamber, whether we know it or not, knows very well we are not. [Laughter and applause.]"

They know very well that we are not any very great judges, too, in interpreting things.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand that this poetry is relative to the views of the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] as to article 1 in this treaty?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is relative to my view of some of these little bits of picayunish amendments offered by the opponents of the league of nations.

I read further:

"FOURTH SENATOR. Mr. President, I see nothing in the captiousness of these my opponents save their captiousness itself. [Laughter.] The expressions employed in this beautiful little prayer are merely forms of speech. They are not theological dogma, nor do they attempt to establish a point in dispute anywhere except, perhaps, between ourselves and the Mohammedans. [Laughter.] This prayer expresses a pretty sentiment. It is unfortunate that it does so in words. Words imply as many meanings as there are minds, and we construe them not by any common rule but according to whatever happens to be our belief. If this were not the most disputatious body on earth [laughter], if it did not put such a premium on cantankerousness as history has never seen equaled [laughter], and if it did not hold the motives of all men to be evil until they are by some miracle proven pure [laughter]—if this deplorable condition did not exist here, Mr. President, we would accept and ratify this prayer, happy in the confidence that our children, whose faith, thank God, is greater than our own, would be glad to say it with no thought that it might mean anything more than that through the night they are to be in the Lord's care. [Applause.] It is beneath our dignity as the most august deliberative body in a great Christian Nation to affect to see in it things no one ever dreamed of putting into it, and our grotesque attempts scientifically to analyze it reflect our own faultiness as a Senate rather than its faultiness as a prayer. [Laughter and applause.]"

That particular Senator seemed to have some gumption.

To continue the reading:

"FIFTH SENATOR. Mr. President, I yield to no man in acceptance of what is good, but our responsibility here is too great to accept anything blindly. The last line of this prayer says:

"I pray the Lord my soul to take.

"What do we know in this Chamber of the soul? Is the soul proven? Is it an accepted thing? Did this body ever say so? Did George Washington ever say so? Is it something established to everybody's satisfaction—a thing past debate in the Senate, and now to be recognized in law? Are we going on from this point to establish the status of soul mates [laughter], and to say finally whether or not corporations have souls? [Laughter.] Mr. President, we tread here upon ground so dangerous that we are likely to be blown up any minute. After centuries of debates among the most learned men the world has known—from Socrates, who died in the happiness of feeling that he would see and talk to Homer, down to Prof. Muensterberg, who went off wondering and promised to signal us if there proved to be anything in it—after all this, Mr. President, the United States is to affirm in the ratification of this prayer the stupendous postulate of immortality! [Laughter and applause.] Mr. President, I don't feel equal to it. [Laughter.] Can you imagine the amaze of a world totally unprepared for any such affirmation from this quarter? [Laughter.] Let us not do that. Let us leave that great matter to those intellectual giants whose minds have never been ground down to the infinite detail of the senatorial function. [Laughter.] A man distributing postmasterships over a sparsely inhabited and none-too-well schooled commonwealth is not accustomed to orienting his thought unto the profound problem whether there is a life after this. [Laughter.]

"This is a sweet line:

"I pray the Lord my soul to take.

"It breathes the very spirit of our Christian land. It has in it all the ingeniousness of childhood. It reposes in, I think, an adequate quarter a beautiful trust. [Laughter.] Still, does the Senate want to make it something more than a matter of faith? Does it want to say it is so? No, Mr. President. We want to leave it just as it is. We want everyone quite free to make of it what he will, coereed by no one—least of all the Senate. [Applause.] It would, after everything else is said, be unconstitutional for us to do so. The Constitution guarantees religious freedom. This prayer implies a religious autocracy. Shall we treat our children any less fairly than we treat ourselves? Would we first ratify here a prayer and then require the Chaplain of the Senate to utter it whenever we convene? [Laughter and applause.] Anyway, who cares what the prayers of a Nation are so long as we can make its laws? [Prolonged applause.]

"SIXTH SENATOR. Information has just reached me of an amazing discourtesy to us all. Copies of this prayer have been in possession of Wall Street for two weeks! [Consternation.]"

Mr. BORAH. Two weeks? He is mistaken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Two weeks he says; I leave questions of time to the author and to the Senator from Idaho to settle. Still continuing the reading:

"Incredible as it is that Wall Street could be interested in any prayer [laughter], I am informed that so far as the important centers of thought and action in this country go ours is about the last to come into possession of this one or to ascertain what is in it. [Groans.] This being the case, I must hold that the prayer is not something with which the Senate can in its dignity at this time have anything whatever to do. [Applause.] Our children can continue to go to bed in the way they have been going to bed. [Applause.] We are perfectly willing to take our chances with Providence, but we won't take any chance with Wall Street. [Laughter and cheers.]"

Mr. President, I read this because I wanted it published in large print instead of small print, as it would have been had I gotten leave to insert in the RECORD; and I do think that as a travesty upon a great deal of tweedledumming and tweedledeeing, and a great deal of "splitting hairs betwixt the nor' and nor'west sides" it is altogether malapropos.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Listening to this exquisite piece of humor and sarcasm which has just been read into the RECORD by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the wish struck me that the author might know a little more of the true inwardness of legislation and discussion in the Senate. If the author lived nearer or was a little more familiar with Washington and with proceedings in the Senate than he is in the backwoods of St. Louis, he would know that if that prayer had been offered here by a Republican for indorsement, immediately one of the Senators upon the opposite side would have risen and objected, and proceeded to make a speech upon Shantung or some other proposition, or engage in just such discussion as the Senator has been reading, while he would say to one of his companions, "Run, run to the telephone and find out whether or not the President wants this indorsement of the prayer," and upon the telephone being rung, and it being discovered that the President was out engaged in a game of golf, he would say, "Well, then, tell Tumulty just what is going on, that a Republican has offered a prayer here, and we do not know whether we should vote for the indorsement until we hear from the President"; and the answer would come back, "Filibuster; filibuster until the President can return and his wishes be known!"

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I compliment the Senator from New Mexico for being almost equal in power as a fiction maker with the other funny man who wrote the article which I read.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I compliment myself at least upon being original, and not being compelled to retail fiction by reading from articles in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall continue to take counsel from my intellectual humility and modesty, which recognizes a good thing, even though I did not originate it. I shall permit the Senator from New Mexico to take counsel from his egotism, which recognizes nothing but his own originality. There are a great many things that I read that are a great deal better than anything that I can say, perhaps even better than a very few things the Senator says that do not come up to his usual standard.

Mr. FALL. There is no doubt about that, Mr. President; and sometimes I think the Senator is justified in his course in reading into the RECORD in every debate editorials or fiction from some fiction writer. However, the real objection that the Senator from Mississippi has, if he has any, to the little statement I have made is that it is an everyday occurrence, with which he is familiar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that also demonstrates how powerfully a man can draw upon his imagination. Sometimes you draw upon it and at first know it is a dream and do not believe it; then you make a second draft, and a third, and a fourth, and after a while you get to the point where you really believe the draft is genuine and will be honored in the court of fact.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am very fond of the Senator from Mississippi, but I think his taste for poetry is perfectly rotten.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that was not poetry. That was prose. The Senator is like the old woman who was very much astonished to find, after she was 70 years old and wanted to know what prose was, that she had been talking prose all her life.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the present occupant of the chair [Mr. WOLCOTT] asked that I insert in the RECORD the treaties to which I made reference:

The Franco-Japanese treaty, which was signed in June, 1907.

The Japan-United States-Russia-Denmark agreement, signed in November, 1908.

The Russo-Japanese convention, signed in July, 1907.

The Anglo-Japanese alliance, signed the last time in July, 1911.

These treaties are found in full in the appendix of a book entitled "Our Eastern Question," by Thomas F. Millar. I think that is a sufficient identification.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether any notices have been given for addresses on Thursday of this week?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). The Chair is advised that no such notices have been given.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give notice, then, that I shall submit some observations on the Shantung question on Thursday, after the completion of the routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended, reported by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I ask leave in this connection to print the statement from the Far Eastern Review and also a memorandum of the Far Eastern Bureau, which contains a very full account of the alleged treaty and also the text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ALLEGED SECRET JAPANESE-GERMAN TREATY.

The following is the draft of the alleged German-Japan treaty of 1918, with explanatory note. It is a copy of a document taken from the official files of the central soviet papers in the Bolshevik archives at Perm on February 2 of this year, when the anti-Bolshevik army ejected the Bolsheviks from the town. The document was obtained by Maj. Slaughter, United States Army, attached to the Siberian army for special service, and was telegraphed in cypher on February 22 from Ekaterinburg to Vladivostok, and thence again in cypher to Washington and Europe.

It is stated that the Bolshevik ambassador to Berlin procured the details of the alleged treaty after the German revolution and the sacking of the German state archives, and telegraphed them to Russia, and as the result the following appeared in the official "Isvestia" of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets, Nos. 255 (519) and 256 (520) of November 22 and 23, 1918:

From fully reliable sources we are informed that:

At the end of October there was received fully reliable and exact information about the arrival in Stockholm of the Japanese Extraordinary Representative Oda, with the aim of carrying on secret conversation with the German ambassador Lutzius concerning the conclusion of a German-Japanese secret treaty. An agreement in principle was reached, after which Oda went to Berlin for the final working out of the treaty itself. The result of the conversation was the draft of a treaty, which, together with the explanatory note attached, we here publish. We are reliably informed that of the German Government no other than Scheidemann supported the project in question, which was, on the other hand, opposed by the deputy of the center, Secretary of State Erzberger. The revolution which took place in Germany prevented the carrying out of the plan which was the expression of the idea of the treaty and which consisted in the following, namely, that a restoration be carried out in Russia by the forces of Germany and Japan and a German, Russian, Japanese alliance be formed in which Russia should be subordinated to the other two partners in the alliance. After the revolution this treaty became known in the German press and it was published by the Hamburg "Red Banner." This disclosure caused animated discussion and bitter polemic, in connection with which the press close to the German Government tried to refute the very fact of the existence of such a draft. Material at our disposal, however, does not leave the slightest doubt of the authenticity of the documents published by us, all the more that in the composition of the present Japanese Cabinet entered one of the most important Japanese statesmen of German orientation, Gen. Tanaka, minister of war, whose pronouncement on the 7th of May, 1917, in defense of an alliance with Germany provoked at that time the protest of all the Allies. Furthermore, from the documents earlier published by the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs it is manifested that efforts toward the conclusion of a separate peace and an alliance between Germany, Russia, and Japan were made by the German Government in March, 1916, by the German ambassador in Stockholm, that same Lutzius, through the Japanese ambassador Ujida (Uchida).

DRAFT OF THE GERMAN-JAPANESE TREATY.

PARAGRAPH 1. Both high contracting parties bind themselves as soon as the world political situation permits, to help the third party, Russia, to obtain under their direction the settlement of her internal affairs and the position of a world power.

PAR. 2. One of the high contracting parties, Japan, binds herself to allow the other high contracting party, Germany, the enjoyment of the prerogatives growing out of her treaties with the third party, Russia, as far as they concern Central Asia and Persia and assist in the conclusion of a most favored nation treaty with mutual (reciprocal) guarantees between the third power and the two contracting powers.

PAR. 3. One of the high contracting parties, Japan, binds herself to allow the other contracting party, Germany, the enjoyment of the rights of most favored nation given to her by the treaties in southern China and of certain privileges growing out of this treaty as yet to be defined in a special treaty, and in this connection both contracting parties bind themselves not to allow the passing of further concessions, in regions yet to be definitely defined, into the hands of foreign powers—America and England.

PAR. 4. One of the high contracting parties, Japan, binds herself indirectly to protect the interests of the other high contracting party, Germany, in the coming peace conference, in a manner agreeable to that party in order that she might suffer as little as possible from the onerous terms of peace in respect to territorial and financial losses.

PAR. 5. One of the two high contracting parties binds herself, on the basis of a treaty to be concluded with the third power after her restoration, to secure for the other contracting party, Germany, the conclusion of a treaty of mutual (reciprocal) guarantees, military, political, and economic, and to lend her services to the other party, Germany, in this direction.

PAR. 6. In return for this the other high contracting party, Germany, binds herself to conclude a secret military convention on land and sea with the aim of an alliance of mutual (reciprocal) guarantees and mutual protection against the aggressive intentions of America and England, the details to be worked out immediately after the conclusion of peace by specially empowered delegates of both high contracting parties.

PAR. 7. The secret treaty resulting herefrom will define the basic lines of foreign policy of the three high contracting parties and may in its full extent and in all its individual paragraphs be worked out immediately after the reestablishing of the third high contracting party, Russia.

PAR. 8. The present treaty is concluded for a period of five years counting from the moment of the restoration of the third party, with the exception of paragraph 4, which goes into effect immediately upon receipt of certificates of ratification. In case none of the high contracting parties announces, six months before the end of the five years' period, the intention of discontinuing the action of the treaty, it automatically remains in force for a further five years' period, until one or another of the contracting powers signifies its intention of discontinuing it.

PAR. 9. The present treaty should be ratified as soon as possible and certificates of ratification should be prepared in duplicate in French and German, the German text being the authentic one for Germany and the French text for Japan.

EXPLANATORY NOTE ATTACHED.

The question whether the western orientation which German policy followed during the whole course of the war was the right one received such an exhaustive answer from the very course of the war and of events that it is doubtful if a critical consideration of it is valuable, the more so that at the present moment it has a merely historical interest and not any real significance. The western orientation brought with itself also the mistake that they (the Germans) did not wish to conclude peace with Russia, because they considered it possible to preserve the continued readiness to carry on the war among the Social Democratic sections of the German people possible only under the motto of the battle against reactionary czarism.

In direct contrast to this was the policy of Japan who concluded in the middle of the war an alliance with Russia, the full meaning of which, in view of the disintegration of Russia, lies in the future.

The existence in Germany of the idea that it would be possible to make peace with England at the expense of Russia, as circumstances showed, was not only unfounded but entailed serious consequences in internal politics for the German Federation of States and for her allies.

This was, however, not the only mistake of the political orientation in question. After Germany reached the conclusion that an agreement with England, either directly or through America, was impossible, she let the moment slip by for a timely agreement with Russia, by means of which she could have thrown over the hoped-for bridge to the Near and Far East.

In all probability by means of such an orientation Germany would have prevented the disintegration of Russia and would have protected and even strengthened her rear in the East in an economic, political, and military sense.

Further, it is unlikely that Bolshevism would have been able to obtain such a clear cut mastery in Russia as has been seen in the past 12 months. In all probability in the event of an Eastern orientation on the part of Germany, its progress or mastery would have been only a momentary phenomenon or episode, and at all events would not have brought on such heavy internal and external catastrophes for that State.

An Eastern orientation of Germany would place England face to face with the necessity of withdrawing from a purposeless war and becoming peace loving because as a result of constant loss of tonnage her future economic development would be under direct threat and a Russia supported by Germany would be a military and political danger to the vital nerves of Asia.

But if supported by Germany, Russia is already a mighty factor constituting a serious danger for England [causing her?] to exercise the greatest caution in carrying out her policy; so much the stronger would this factor be if Japan, supported on the Continent by Germany and Russia, should joint the alliance. Such an orientation would constitute a very great danger for America and England.

From the foregoing it follows that the center of gravity of future world politics lies in the reestablishment of a Russia freed of Bolshevism and supported from outside for a number of years in which Germany and Japan would be equally interested.

From this Japan would gain the advantage by virtue of the treaty of mutual support with Germany and Russia; she would become a very strong military force with which America would have to reckon, all the more so that the divergence between England and America on the basis of the self-determination of nations is only a matter of time.

The new political alliance would mean a double advantage, both a political and an economical one, as she (Russia) would be economically strengthened by Germany and Japan, and would be politically protected against English and American aggression while she would again rise to the position of a world power.

For Germany economic advantage would be in the form of considerable concessions in Turkestan, thanks to which she could make herself independent of America in cotton and paper. In a political and military sense Germany would receive full cover for her rear on land through Russia and on sea through Japan.

The final end of such an alliance would be the complete removal of England from Asia, the isolation of England from America, through Canada and India, and the economic expulsion of America from Siberia and England from Russia on the one hand and the exploitation of China, Central Asia, and Persia on the other, the spheres of influence being divided according to the following boundaries: Germany receives freedom of action in South China, Persia, and Central Asia, while Japan can declare her pretensions to northern China, Manchuria, Korea, and Eastern Siberia.

SOURCE OF DOCUMENT.

The text of this alleged German-Japanese (Russian) alliance was secured by the representative of the Soviet Republic in Berlin following the German revolution and the sacking of the State archives. The Bolshevist ambassador telegraphed it to Russia, where it appeared in the official organ of the "All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets" (the Isvestia).

The United States came into possession of this document about two months afterwards, where it was found among the Bolshevist archives at Perm, Siberia, following the capture of that place by the anti-Bolshevist forces, February 2, 1919. (Agreement originally published Nov. 22–23, 1919, in the Isvestia, issues No. 255 (519) and No. 256 (520) in Petrograd.)

The transmitter was, it is said, Maj. Slaughter, United States Army, detailed on special service to Siberia.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT IN POSSESSION OF TEXT.

We understand this text to have been regarded as important enough in Siberia to telegraph it in cipher, February 22, 1919, from Ekaterinburg to Vladivostok, where it was again put into cipher and cabled to the United States.

The contents thus should have reached the Department of State by March 1, as well as the British and French foreign offices, about the same time.

CHINA FORCES PUBLICITY.

Public knowledge of this alleged transaction came from our associate in the Great War, the Republic of China. Coming into possession of this document from another source the Chinese Government cabled its contents to the Paris conference.

ALLIANCE OF OCTOBER, 1918, SECOND ENTENTE (NOT ALLEGED JAPANESE-GERMAN TREATY OF MARCH, 1916).

The significance of this second disclosure—entirely different from one of three years ago—can not be overlooked. During 1918 it was denied by England, France, and Japan, as well as subsequently discredited by America, that the alleged arrangements made between Germany and Japan concluded by Lutzius (for Germany) and Uchida (the Japanese ambassador to Russia then and now foreign minister) in March, 1916, in Sweden, had any validity, published in Russia by the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs.

Neither the British nor French foreign offices, or the Department of State, however, have given an official verdict.

If they were willing to scout the validity of the first alleged German-Japanese pact of 1916, why should these powers not do the same to this second treaty of October, 1918?

Is the answer in the matter that the second document can not be so denied; that there are diplomatic grounds for its existence?

ALLEGED GERMAN-JAPANESE NEGOTIATIONS, 1918.

This pact, neither confirmed nor denied by the powers affected, is said to have been negotiated in its preliminaries at Stockholm. Japan was represented by an obscure official named Oda, Germany again by Lutzius. Conversations were begun in the latter part of October, 1918.

An agreement in principle being reached, the final draft was made in Berlin.

As for the German attitude, Scheidemann is said to have supported the move, while Erzberger headed the opposition. The document came out during the collapse of Imperial Germany, the Hamburg Red Banner being the first to publish it.

VALIDITY OF THE PACT BY INTERNAL EVIDENCE.

The alleged pact has a comprehensiveness and carries a statesmanship which the first agreement published lacked. The historical setting of the new disclosures puts its consummation at the time Prince Max of Baden was in power. While this was a moment when the German armies were in retreat on the west front, the alliance showed considerable internal evidence of farsighted statecraft. (See Provisions, which clearly show this to be a logical reinsurance treaty, realizing that Germany had been defeated.)

Furthermore, ex-Premier Terauchi declared in the spring of 1918 that an alliance with Germany was a possible development of Japanese statecraft. Moreover, Lieut. Gen. Tanaka, subsequently war minister under Terauchi, stated openly that Japan should have a German alliance. This statement of May 7, 1917, aroused allied objections.

RELATION TO NEW REGIONAL UNDERSTANDING OF 1919.

This German-Japanese combination may be an important element in the present relations between Japan and Britain and France at present, explaining the rumored willingness of the two latter powers to divide the east with Japan along terms paralleling those alleged above.

POWERS WILL NOT REPUDIATE TREATY UNLESS BOLSHEVIK FORGERY.

A statement from Germany or the evasive denial of the alleged pact's validity recently made by Minister Obata in Peking, on behalf of Japan, will not carry any weight.

Nothing may be expected to be forthcoming from the powers affected unless they are convinced that it is a Bolshevik forgery.

DRAFT OF ALLEGED CONVENTION.

Paragraph 1. Both high contracting parties bind themselves, as soon as the world political situation permits, to help the third party, Russia, to obtain under their direction the settlement of her internal affairs and the position of a world power.

Par. 2. One of the high contracting parties, Japan, binds herself to allow the other high contracting party, Germany, the enjoyment of the prerogatives growing out of her treaties with the third party, Russia, as far as they concern central Asia and Persia and assist in the conclusion of a most-favored-nation treaty with mutual (reciprocal) guaranties between this third power and the two contracting powers.

Par. 3. One of the high contracting parties, Japan, binds herself to allow the other contracting party, Germany, the enjoyment of the rights of most favored nation given to her by the treaties in southern China, and of certain privileges growing out of this treaty as yet to be defined in a special treaty, and in this connection both contracting parties bind themselves not to allow the passing of further concessions in regions yet to be definitely defined into the hands of foreign powers—America and England.

One of the high contracting parties, Japan, binds herself indirectly to protect the interests of the other high contracting party, Germany, in the coming peace conference, in a manner agreeable to that party in order that she might suffer as little as possible from the onerous terms of peace in respect to territorial and financial losses.

Par. 5. One of the two high contracting parties binds herself on the basis of a treaty to be concluded with the third power after her restoration to secure for the other contracting party, Germany, the conclusion of a treaty of mutual (reciprocal) guaranties, military, political, and economic, and to lend her services to the other party, Germany, in this direction.

Par. 6. In return for this the other high contracting party, Germany, binds herself to conclude a secret military convention on land and sea with the aim of an alliance of mutual (reciprocal) guaranties and mutual protection against the aggressive intentions of America and England, the details to be worked out immediately after the conclusion of peace by specially empowered delegates of both high contracting parties.

Par. 7. The secret treaty resulting herefrom will define the basic lines of foreign policy of the three high contracting parties, and may in its full extent and in all its individual paragraphs be worked out immediately after the reestablishment of the third high contracting party, Russia.

Par. 8. The present treaty is concluded for a period of five years counting from the moment of the restoration of the third party, with the exception of paragraph 4, which goes into effect immediately upon receipt of ratification. In case none of the high contracting parties announces six months before the end of the five-year period the intention of discontinuing the action of the treaty, it automatically remains in force for a further five-year period, until one or another of the contracting parties signifies its intention of discontinuing it.

Par. 9. The present treaty should be ratified as soon as possible and certificates of ratification should be prepared in duplicate in French and German, the German text being the authentic one for Germany and the French text for Japan.

EDSEL FORD'S EXEMPTION CASE.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, a few days ago, seeking to inform myself and to refresh my memory, I went to the War Department in order to find some evidence on the returns made by the local boards from the State of Michigan, to prepare myself for an election contest pending here, which some time will be heard. The Secretary of War, through The Adjutant General, refused me access to the public records. I have no right to see the questionnaires in those matters. They are sealed up, and are not matters of public record; but under the rules of the War Department, or the Provost Marshal General, rather, the second edition, and especially under section 11 of the rules, all except the matters relating to the family history and the physical and mental examination of the registrant are declared to be public records. I sought to see those public records, and that right was denied me by the Secretary of War. I have prepared my views on that question, but owing to the lateness of the hour I do not care to make an address on the subject, but I ask to have them printed. I think they will be sufficiently illuminating without any oral utterance. I ask that they be printed in the ordinary type and not in small type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that a request to print remarks, more or less in the nature of a leave to print, has never been granted in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will read it or I will speak it. I desired to save the time, but I appreciate that a precedent ought not to be made.

A NATIONAL SCANDAL.

I recently applied to Secretary of War Baker to read the records in the Edsel Ford exemption case. The Secretary denied the right, saying through The Adjutant General that matters mental and physical and family dependency were so mingled with the other records as to make it improper. Those exempted subjects are all in the sealed questionnaire, and are in no way connected with the public records of the Ford exemption. The Secretary knows this. His action is solely to shield a presidential pet, who was kept out of the military service of the United States by a gross abuse of Executive power. Secretary Baker conceals the proof of the President's favoritism in this case and his own connivance with it as Secretary of War. The humble citizen with a wife and child but no millionaire father and order from the President to exempt him from the service may well doubt the good faith of the executive heads who apply the draft law. The young man who left his family to live on $30 a month and his wife's efforts would like to read the public record of Edsel Ford's exemption. It is a disgraceful affair, and Secretary Baker well knows the only safety for the President and himself is in suppressing the record of it.

Henry Ford is asking to unseat the sitting Member from Michigan who ran against him last November. The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and desired to inspect those records as material evidence in that contest. Henry Ford alleges votes were had against him by the corrupt use of money. I wish to examine his course in procuring the exemption of his son from military service, and the President's orders to that end, to show Ford was defeated by the people of Michigan in resentment and disgust at such discrimination. That evidence was denied me, and so much of my preparation of the hearing of that contest waits.

In the absence of a reading of the records, I am compelled to rely on secondary evidence. Any inaccuracies which may appear are due to this lack of primary evidence.

An examination of the rule shows that it was drafted for the sole purpose of creating exemptions. I read from page 8 of Selective Service Regulations (second edition), section 11:

All records required by these rules and regulations to be filed with and kept by local and district boards, adjutants general, and other persons in connection with the registration, examination, selection, and mobilization of registrants under the selective-service law, and these regulations shall be public records and shall be open during usual business hours for public inspection of any and all persons. (See sec. 12.)

Provided, however, That the answers of any registrant concerning the condition of his health, mental or physical, in response to Series II of the questions under the head entitled "Physical fitness" in the questionnaire, and other evidence and records upon the same subject, and the answer of any registrant to the questions under series X of the questions under the head entitled "Dependency" in the questionnaire, except the names and addresses of the persons claimed to be dependent upon such registrants, shall not, without the consent of the registrant, be open to inspection by any person other than members of local and district boards.

And so forth, naming other officers.

Now that the President is again on his native soil he might profitably give attention to this national scandal, which begun at his table and reached back to Detroit, Mich. Three hundred and sixty-eight thousand and sixty-four men registered in Michigan for military service June 5, 1917. Among them was Edsel Ford, son of Henry Ford, late a candidate for Senator in that State, and is now a contestant for a seat in this body.

Edsel Ford was called before his local board No. 21, Detroit, physically examined, and passed. No claim of exemption was made to the local board, but within five days he claimed exemption to the district board. He asserted he was an industrial necessity in his father's factory, which would suffer material loss if he was separated from it. Among supporting affidavits is that of Henry Ford, his father, who averred it would be a substantial and material loss to remove his son Edsel from the pay roll. Only a short time before this Ford had testified in the suit of Dodge against Ford that not a single man in his entire industry was necessary to him, so perfect was his system of organization.

Edsel Ford was about 23 years old at that time. His experience was limited, and it did not appear in detail what the character of his work performed was. It appeared the company was wonderfully organized with a variety of executives, experts in their respective lines. It was the largest individual industry in the district, numbering many large enterprises. Yet Edsel Ford was the only man in the entire district claiming occupational exemption, alleging he was necessary to the successful operation of the business. The quota of the district was 12,539 men. When the board decided the case it had actually certified to The Adjutant General for service 11,080 men. This had required an examination by the local boards of the district of about 70,000 registrants. The district board unanimously denied his discharge from military service. The board was composed of three Democrats and two Republicans, all men of wide experience in practical affairs. They say:

It is unthinkable that this young man, 23 years of age, should be the only one of his class in this entire examination.

It is further observed by the board:

It is a matter of general knowledge that Mr. Ford got along in business surprisingly well for a long period of time without any help from his son. We have no doubt but that during this critical period in our country's progress he will find a way to continue to do so.

The board adds:

To say that the loss of service to the Ford Motor Car Co., with their wonderful organization, of this young man would result in a direct substantial material loss to the company is obviously absurd. To allow this claim would not only fail to maintain the national interest, but would seriously, adversely, affect the national interest during the present emergency. We can think of no one thing that would more deservedly subject the selective draft to serious criticism and the imputation of special favoritism than to allow the claim for exemption herein urged.

From this unanimous decision of the district board Edsel Ford appealed to the President for exemption from military service into which thousands of his fellow countrymen had been drafted. He asked for a stay of drafting into the service pending the appeal, which was granted, and all papers were promptly forwarded to the President, who kept them September, October, November, and part of December, 1917. On December 15, 1917, the Revised Selective Service Regulations, Form 999, became effective. The records of the district board No. 1, of Detroit, will show several hundred appeals were made to the President, and most of them were decided before the revised regulations were promulgated, leaving Edsel Ford's appeal the only one on the President's table. An order was simultaneously issued that no undecided cases pending on presidential appeal should be returned to the boards and any registrant affected by the appeal should have come under the new system with its benefits and advantages. It is generally believed that Henry Ford made a direct application to the President in Edsel's appeal, and as a result Gen. Crowder was, much against his own choice, required by the President so to form the new regulations as to create a class into which Edsel Ford could fall and be exempted without arousing too much attention or comment.

Note class 2-a of the new regulations:

Married men with children, or father of motherless children, where such wife or children or such motherless children are not mainly dependent on his labor for support, for reason that there are other reasonable certain sources of adequate support excluding earnings or possible earnings from labor of wife available and that the removal of registrant will not deprive such dependents of support.

An examination of such rule shows it does not comply with the act of May 18, 1917, or the Provost Marshal General, as first interpreted and applied to him. The law permitted the President to exempt only those in a "status with respect to persons dependent on them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable."

The words in the new regulations "mainly dependent for support" in class 2-a is a palpable invasion of the law, because class 1 furnished 2,800,000 men and was constantly increased by new registrants. It was most likely that class 2-a would never be reached. The rank favoritism, however, under class 2-a and the definition in the Selective Service Regulations, second edition, page 46, is apparent. I quote:

Registrants may claim and may be entitled to deferred classification, class 2a * * * although wife or children are not mainly dependent upon his labor for support.

A grosser perversion and abuse of Executive power or nullification of an act of Congress can not be cited.

The draft boards and the public voiced a tremendous protest against such an arbitrary, unjust rule. Many draft boards refused to classify anybody under it. It was known all over Michigan and elsewhere as the Edsel class. Young Ford, on the creation of class 2-a, immediately claimed exemption under it. The local board denied it in spite of the new rule. He appealed to the district board, which exempted him by a vote of 3 to 2.

The effect on the draft was so disastrous in Michigan that the Government ordered two investigations, and the President tendered, while one of them was pending, a commission to Edsel Ford, which he refused. Neither as an officer or a private was he willing to serve his country. He had a wife and one child, and was exempted under the second regulations, while other married men with children or whose cases had been decided had gone to war or were waiting to go to war under the first regulations. These men had the law changed arbitrarily in plain view by the President to exempt Edsel Ford, while under the first ruling they were drafted. The new or second rule was not applied so those who had not gone to camps but who had failed to appeal to the President would have the benefit of it. A protest went up against this discrimination that made even the hardened departmental officers wince. It explains why the Secretary of War refused to let the public records of the case be seen by a Member of Congress. They can not stand daylight.

Why was Edsel Ford's case held up by the President for months? There was nothing complicated about it. A young man 23 years old claimed he was indispensable to an industry. His father was of enormous wealth and head of what he had sworn was so perfect a corporate organization that nobody's death or withdrawal would affect it. Both the local and district boards had unanimously refused to exempt him. The long delay was to contrive a rule that would release him from service. It took time to invent something that would send many thousands to war and exempt a wealthy protégé of Executive favor.

The appeal ought to have been immediately decided and returned, so drafted men would know Edsel Ford was an example to show that all were treated alike and the draft law was what it was intended to be, a common rule for all instead of a house of refuge built by special regulations to except a wealthy scion of a wealthy father. It was demonstrated that the decision was delayed and young Ford escaped with no actual dependency on him of any kind under any rules or laws. Until this special exemption was framed for Ford, the act itself and every rule promulgated by Gen. Crowder made actual dependency the sole and only test.

Hundreds of thousands were conscripted under the first regulations and the Army was practically raised under rules from which Edsel Ford was at last removed by long delay and a special rule devised by the President palpably for no other purpose.

It was regarded as so gross an exhibition of favoritism that registrants in Michigan did not hesitate to claim the benefit of class 2-a. In other States draft boards did not take the new rule seriously and registrants were ashamed to avail themselves of it. This is demonstrated by the following statement:

In Michigan there were 411,000 registrants and 84,601 in class 2-a.

That shows that the indignation in Michigan was pronounced and widespread.

In Alabama there were 206,248 registrants and 20,850 in class 2-a.

In New York there were 1,120,332 registrants and 74,715 in class 2-a.

In Pennsylvania there were 902,996 registrants and 79,794 in class 2-a.

In Ohio there were 617,371 registrants and 47,467 in class 2-a.

In California there were 332,593 registrants and 13,177 in class 2-a.

In Massachusetts there were 398,364 registrants and 31,330 in class 2-a.

In Wisconsin there were 266,691 registrants and 24,392 in class 2-a.

Comment on such a rule is needless when New York with 1,120,332 registrants, nearly three times Michigan's, had only 74,715 men, 10,000 fewer than Michigan, claim exemption under the Edsel Ford rule made expressly for him by the President.

We can now understand why Ford, the father, became a candidate for the United States Senate in Michigan because the President asked him to. It explains why the Secretary of War protects both the Fords by refusing the right to examine the public records in the case. What a democracy of military service it is! The Secretary does well to suppress the public records of his Chief's and his own evasion of law and shameless abuse of power.

I have a statement and some quotations that I wish to insert without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A STATEMENT ON A NATIONAL WAR SCANDAL.

"On June 5, 1917, 368,064 men registered in Michigan for a military service. Among them was Edsel Ford, son of Henry Ford, late a candidate for Senator in that State and now a contestant in this body. Of these registrants 135,341 were accepted for service. Of those accepted 44,516 went to camp and abroad before November 15, 1917, when the President promulgated the new regulation and when Edsel Ford's appeal was returned by the President without action. Of these 44,516 named accepted for service from the State of Michigan under the first regulations of the draft law 6,840 were married men, as it appears from the report of the Provost Marshal General.

"Edsel Ford was a registrant of local board 21, Detroit, which under the first draft regulation had a registration of 2,449. Four hundred and forty-eight were accepted physically. After the June 5, 1917, regulation under the selective-service law of May 18, 1917, regulations were promulgated June 30, 1917, by the Secretary of War, known as the Rules and Regulations, Form 13.

"The act authorized, under section 4 of the law of May 18, 1917, the President to exempt persons engaged in industry, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interests during the emergency, and those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable, and those found to be physically or morally deficient. The foregoing act used only the word 'exemption,' and it is to be noted only authorized the President through the machinery of the draft boards which he was to create under the act, and the regulations which he was to promulgate for their guidance under the act to exempt on the ground of dependency 'those in a status with respect to persons dependent on them for support, which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable.' It will be seen later that the promulgation of the second regulation was an avoidance of the words in the act 'persons dependent on them for support.'

"Under the first regulation promulgated by the President to govern the registrants of June 5, 1917, Form 13, the system was, in brief, that local and district boards were created in each State. The local boards had exclusive jurisdiction over the dependency and certain other claims for exemption made by the registrants and had complete control of the physical examination, mobilization, and entrainment of the men. The district boards had appellate jurisdiction of the appeal of the man if held for service, and upon the Government's appeal is exempted over all registrants. Such boards had exclusive jurisdiction of claims made on industrial or agricultural grounds. Under these first regulations all men were first examined by their local boards, and then on very informal, brief, and easily understood blanks made their claims before the local board if they desired. If they passed their physical examination and had no claims within the jurisdiction of the local board, such as dependency, they filed their claim for industrial or agricultural exemption with the district board. This claim consisted of a small blank to be filed with the district board, setting forth their claims and supported by as many affidavits as they cared to procure in support thereof. The district board then passed upon the same, and if the registrant was not satisfied, he could within seven days appeal to the President. It then became the duty of the district board to certify the entire record in respect to such claim to the President, who might affirm, modify, or reverse the decision.

"The first regulations provided, as to dependency, as follows: 'Any married man whose wife or child is dependent upon his labor for support' might be exempted upon the showing that the income from which the wife or child received their support was mainly derived from property or other sources independent of his mental or physical labor. Exemptions were only provided for 'those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support, which renders their exclusion or discharge desirable.'

"The man and his wife had to make a very full showing as to the income of each of them and of each child, and of any sums contributed to them and from what the sums were derived. The regulations provided that the term 'labor,' as used in the regulations, meant the fruit of mental or physical effort and not income derived from property or other sources independent of mental or physical labor.

"After the promulgation of these regulations a number of rulings were handed down by the Provost Marshal General, principal among which was the 'ready, willing, and able' regulation, which is said to have been procured directly from the President, and which, in brief, was that if either the registrant's relatives, or his wife's relatives, or his children's relatives were ready, willing, and able to support his wife and children in the husband's absence, then no case of dependency was made out. This situation is referred to in the first report of the Provost Marshal General, after the first draft was through, published December 20, 1917. In this report, at page 22, Gen. Crowder says:

"The most difficult problem of selecting for the local boards was raised by the question of dependency, and especially in its relation to married men of draftable age. There has been some very significant debate in the Senate on consideration of the bill as to whether married men should be exempted from the first draft as such, or whether the determinative principle should be dependency, as it had been agreed that it should be in all other relationships. An amendment exempting married men as such was rejected by the Senate on the direct issue that there was no equity in excusing a married man and necessarily sending a single man to the battle front in his place, when no condition of dependency of the wife existed in fact. There is much to be said on both sides of this question, but it was for this office to execute the law and not to debate it.

"It is significant that on December 20, 1917, Gen. Crowder saw fit to abide by the sentiment of the Senate and to execute the law and not to debate it, by not exempting married people merely because they were married. But, by the time he promulgated his second regulations, he had a change of heart and succeeded in defeating the Senate by—instead of using the word 'exemption,' as used in the act—using the word 'deferment,' and creating five classes, knowing, however, that classes 2 and 3 and 5 were tantamount to exemption. To show that he did know this we have but to refer to the report of December 20, 1917, where, in large type, at page 35, in speaking of the creation of the new system, he says:

"No human mind can forecast the resultant numbers in class 1, but (as the roughest guess, based on the experiences of the first draft) it is estimated that class 1 will comprise a list of physically acceptable men, in number close to 1,000,000—enough for any call in present prospect. Whether this guess be justified in practice or not, it can be announced now as the policy and belief of this office and in all probability it will be possible to fill our military needs without ever invading any class more deferred than class 1; and this is the promise, the standard, and the goal, here for the first time announced, toward which every administrative effort of this office shall be directed.

"Gen. Crowder, in his second report, issued December 20, 1918, after the close of the war, at page 2, quotes this standard and goal set by his office, and says:

"The promise has been fulfilled. Our fighting forces were supplied with men from class 1 only. From the ordinary walks of civil life 2,810,296 men were drawn and placed in the military service. But the deferred classes have remained intact. When hostilities closed there remained in class 1 a supply of fighting men sufficient to meet every military necessity.

"And if the course of the second draft, after the creation of the five classes, be followed, it will be seen what efforts were made by Gen. Crowder to keep class 1 filled, so as not to invade the other classes. He did this by the creation of the "work or fight" and other orders. In the first report Gen. Crowder, after making his remark that he was to execute the law and not debate it, continues:

"It may not be amiss to remark, however, that the net result of the provision was to extract from the field of persons who had no claim of exemption other than the fact that they were married 163,115. And of the 1,294,830 persons discharged on all possible grounds of exemption, 748,762, or 58 per cent, were discharged on the ground of dependency accruing from marriage. There were 1,500,056 married persons called, and only 163,115, or less than 11 per cent chosen.

"The question of actual dependency was left to the boards to determine. It can hardly be said that local boards composed of the neighbors of men to be taken for military service were not the best conceivable tribunals to weigh these questions of dependency, or that they could not be relied upon both to protect the Government from the insistence of selfish and thoughtless claimants on the one hand, and to treat each case of substantial merit with intelligence and sympathetic consideration on the other. In by far the majority of boards this result was attained, but in a very few instances such an uncompromising view of the regulations and the rulings issued in aid thereof was taken that some married men were selected, leaving wives and even children in distress.

"It must be recognized that there were very great difficulties in deciding individual cases. * * *

"Very early in the execution of the law the specific question was put to this office: 'Where the parents of the registrant, or his wife, or both, are ready, able, and willing to undertake the support of the wife during the absence of the registrant can the wife be considered as mainly dependent on the labor of the registrant for support?' It is an extremely dangerous thing to attempt to guide the discretion of so large a collection of tribunals. * * * At the time this question was propounded reports from the various governors were rather alarming, since it was stated that over 70 per cent of registrants were claiming exemption on the ground of dependency. A considerable class of cases had been brought to the attention of this office in which men who had never really supported their wives, but who were, in fact, dependent on their own parents or the parents of their wives, were claiming exemption on the ground that their wives were 'mainly dependent on their daily labor for support.' * * *

"On August 8, therefore, a ruling was made that in that class of cases where the registrant, as a matter of fact was not dependent upon himself, and the parents of the registrant or of his wife were ready, able, and willing to undertake the support of the wife during the absence of the husband, the boards would be justified in finding that such a registrant had not a good claim for exemption on the ground of the dependency of his wife.

"This ruling did not work well. The few boards that had been prone to hold married men for service in the absence of the most unequivocal circumstance of dependency took the ruling as authority to look into the material wealth of the parents of the husband or of the wife. Regardless of readiness and willingness, regardless of whether or not the wife had in the past been actually dependent on the labor of the husband for support, these boards held some married men for service wherever it appeared to them that, rather than let the wife suffer, the parents would undertake her support during the absence of the husband.

"As soon as this condition developed attention of the boards was called to the error on August 27, and the district boards were cautioned to scan cases before them on appeal to correct such errors. On September 27 local boards were instructed to reopen and reconsider cases in which such erroneous action had been taken, even though the registrant might have been inducted into military service in the meantime.

"It will be noted that at the very time Gen. Crowder wrote the above, the appeal of Edsel Ford was nominally on the President's desk and actually in Gen. Crowder's office, probably on Col. Warren's desk; and that he nowhere in this report refers to the cases of married men with or without children possessed of ample means themselves to support their dependents in their absence, or whose wives were possessed of the same means. In Edsel Ford's case both parties, husband and wife, were possessed of ample, independent means.

"In Gen. Crowder's second report, in speaking of the situation under the first draft regulations, he refers to the fact that class I was constantly being replenished by the new registrants arriving at age, and by men giving up exemptions granted to them and by other means.

"In the second report Gen. Crowder made after the war he takes up the subject of dependency at page 108, and speaks of the rulings during 1917, under which Edsel Ford first came, and under which he should have been sent to war. He speaks of the case of the wife able to obtain support from her own labor or from the assistance of relatives of herself or her husband. He says that August 8, 1917, he issued a ruling that no dependency should be deemed to exist in the following cases:

"1. Where the parents or other relatives of the wife or the husband are able, ready, and willing to provide adequate support for her (and children, if any) during the absence of the husband.

"2. Where the wife owns land which has produced income by the husband's labor, but which could, with reasonable certainty, be rented during his absence to other persons so as to produce an adequate support.

"3. Where there exists some arrangement by which the salary or wage of the husband is continued, in whole or in part, by third persons, being employers or insurers or others, and such portion of the salary or wage, either alone or with an allotment of his soldier's pay, or with other definite income, will furnish a reasonably adequate support.

"Gen. Crowder continues:

"The matter having been presented to the President, the following were his orders thereon:

"'We ought as far as practicable to raise this new National Army without creating the hardships necessarily entailed when the head of the family is taken, and I hope for the most part those accepted in the first call would be found to be men who had not yet assumed such relations. The selective service law makes the fact of dependence, rather than the fact of marriage, the basis for exemption, and there are undoubtedly, many cases within the age limits fixed by law, of men who are married and yet whose accumulations or other economic surroundings are such that no dependency of the wife exists in fact. Plainly, the law does not contemplate exemption for this class of men. The regulations promulgated on June 20, 1917, should be regarded as controlling these cases, and the orders issued under that regulation directing exemption boards to establish the fact of dependents in addition to the fact of marriage ought not to be abrogated.'

"Accordingly, the following ruling was announced: (Compiled Rulings, P. M. G. O., No. 10, par. 1, Aug. 27) Dependency—Other sources of support.—Paragraph B, Compiled Rulings of this office, No. 6, addressed a state of affairs where the parents or other relatives of the wife or husband are able, ready, and willing adequately to support the wife and children, if any, during the absence of the husband. This ruling was responsive to a class of cases that had been brought to the attention of this office where claims of discharge had been made on the ground of dependency on a husband who, as a matter of fact, was not dependent upon himself. The ruling directed the attention of local boards to the fact that scrutiny of cases of this kind might disclose that no discharge was advisable. It was not intended in paragraph B, Compiled Rulings No. 6, should apply to the case of a head of a family whose family at the time of his summons and prior thereto were and had been mainly dependent upon his labor for support. At the same time for the specific case of a wife able to earn a livelihood by her own skill it was announced that 'where the wife and children were actually dependent on the applicant's labor for support and where there are no other means of support, the wife should not be put to the necessity of going to work to support herself'; and that such claims should therefore be recognized 'where in his absence they will be left without reasonably adequate support, after duly taking into consideration the soldier's wage and support from relatives partially or totally previously extended to the applicant himself.'

"It was thus apparent that though the principle of dependency as distinguished from marriage alone was the fundamental characteristic of the law and the regulations, yet its application developed a number of well-defined intermediary cases of varying degrees of equity, upon which the local boards could not be expected to deal with uniformity to general satisfaction. The first system of selection, therefore, while well adapted to cases where the presence or the absence of dependency was unmistakable, was found to lack sufficient flexibility to cover satisfactorily the great mass of intermediary cases.

"Gen. Crowder then, at page 111, justifies the creation of class 2-a. This concludes the remarks on the first system of the draft, and we resume the discussion of Edsel Ford's particular case under it. In August, 1917, Edsel Ford was called before local board No. 21, Detroit, physically examined, and passed. He made no claim to the local board, but within five days filed a claim with the district board, claiming to be a necessary employee in a necessary industry which would suffer substantially and materially loss and detriment if he was taken from it. This affidavit had a number of supporting affidavits, including that of his father, Henry Ford. The affidavit of the latter was palpably false, as he had testified a short time before in the case of Dodge against Ford pending in the Wayne Circuit Court that not a single man in his entire industry was necessary to him, such was the perfection of his system. This claim came up before the district board in Detroit, being district board No. 1, of Michigan, composed of Hon. James O. Murfin, a former circuit judge of the State, a regent of the University of Michigan, and a well-known lawyer; the Hon. Frank H. Croul, former police commissioner of the city and a prominent merchant and manufacturer; Henry B. Ledyard, Esq., a prominent lawyer; the Hon. James B. Cunningham, a prominent Democratic politician and former labor commissioner of the State; and a Dr. Trizsky. Croul and Murfin were Republicans and the other three Democrats. This board unanimously denied Ford's claim by exemption and rendered, in part, the following opinion:

"The character of this application for an occupational exemption makes it seem desirable to file in this case a formal opinion in order that it may be used as a guide to the public and ourselves for future action.

"Edsel Ford is 23 years of age and only son of Henry Ford, the founder and present guiding spirit of the Ford Motor Car Co. While the claim is not supported by any showing from the chief executive of the company, there are supporting affidavits before us filed in support of this claim by subordinate officers.

"It appears from these affidavits that the applicant is a director, vice president, secretary, and treasurer of the recently organized corporation known as Henry Ford & Son. For two years he has been director, vice president, and secretary of the Ford Motor Car Co. There is no serious claim made that any substantial part of his activities are at the present time devoted to Henry Ford & Son. The exact nature of his duties with the Ford Motor Car Co. does not appear in detail, nor is there before us any definite statement of the character of the work he has been in the habit of performing. Running through the record, however (and this is substantiated by statements made to the board), it appears that primarily and principally this young man is being used in the business to relieve his father of some responsibility and do some of his father's work when Mr. Henry Ford is otherwise engaged.

"Is the given individual necessary to the industry? Our instructions from the President in connection with this phase of the case reads as follows:

"'The evidence must also establish, even if the particular industrial enterprise * * * is found necessary * * * that the continuance of such person therein is necessary to the maintenance thereof, and that he can not be replaced by another person without direct, substantial, material loss and detriment to the adequate and effective operation of the particular industrial enterprise * * * in which he is engaged.'

"In the light of these instructions, the determination of this last question becomes quite simple. It is not an exaggeration to state that the fame and reputation of the Ford Motor Car Co. organization is little short of marvelous, and its demonstrated efficiency is known the world over. The extraordinary achievements of this company would have been impossible but for the wonderful organization built up, in which the executives take and should take a very proper pride. It is a most significant fact that this industry, far and away the largest individual industry within our district, should have, at the time this claim for an occupational exemption was filed, but one man of draft age claimed to be necessary to its successful operation. The quota on the present call for our district is 12,539 men. More than this number have already been certified to our board by the various locals within our jurisdiction, and at the time this case was considered we had actually certified to The Adjutant General for service 11,080 men. This had involved an examination by the local boards of approximately 70,000 men. It is unthinkable that this young man, 23 years of age, should be the only one of his class in this entire examination.

"There can be no doubt that it is at all times commendable for any son to gradually prepare himself to help his father, but for us to excuse this young man from military service we must find under our regulations that he is necessary to this industry. It is a matter of general knowledge that Mr. Henry Ford got along in business surprisingly well for a long period of time without any help from his son. We have no doubt but that during this critical period in our country's progress he will find a way without much inconvenience to continue to do so.

"The primary object of the occupational exemption clause of the Selective Draft Act is to exempt from military service trained and skilled artisans whose work can not be duplicated by men over the draft age. It is not contemplated that bookkeepers, cashiers, and men of that description should be in the exempt class, and only in certain cases can an executive officer be said to be of the exempt class. Such cases do arise and will arise in the future but they are rare and exceptional in their nature. To say that the loss of service to the Ford Motor Car Co., with their wonderful organization, of this young man would result in a direct, substantial, material loss to the Ford Motor Car Co. is obviously absurd.

"It is a matter of common knowledge that Mr. James H. Cousins, a business man of ripened and matured experience, who had grown up with this business from its infancy, severed his connection abruptly but without an apparent direct, substantial, and material loss. * If the organization is so perfect as not to feel the loss of a man of his character and description, how can we possibly find that there would be the loss contemplated by the statute if the applicant herein severed his connection with the company?

"No definition has yet been given by any district board or The Adjutant General of the phrase in the law reading, 'The maintenance of national interest during the emergency,' but, in our opinion, there is here presented a case when the national interest during the present emergency would be very seriously affected if a claim would not only fail to maintain the national interest but, in our judgment, would seriously adversely affect the national interest during the present emergency. We can think of no one thing that would more deservedly subject the selective draft to serious criticism and the imputation of special favoritism than to allow the claim for exemption herein urged.

"Because of these reasons we reached the conclusion that the application for a discharge from military service would have to be denied.

"DISTRICT BOARD, DIVISION No. 1, EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN."

"Edsel Ford then appealed to the President and asked for a stay of induction pending the appeal, which was granted; and the papers were then promptly forwarded to the President and remained with the President September, October, November, and were not returned till December, without action, when the President promulgated his new rules and regulations, with five classes; and Gen. Crowder simultaneously issued an order that no undecided cases on presidential appeal should be returned to the boards, and the registrants come under the new system, with its benefits and advantages.

"Revised Regulation, Form 999, known as the Selective Service Regulations, or S. S. R., became effective December 15. The records of district board No. 1 of Detroit will show that several hundred appeals were made to the President, and most of them, subsequent to the appeal of Edsel Ford, but all of them were decided before the new regulations went in, and it is said that Edsel Ford's appeal was the only one remaining upon the President's desk.

"Before going into the new regulations, which, in my opinion, were not justified by the act of May 18, 1917, it may be said here that it is generally rumored that direct appeal to the President was made in Edsel Ford's case after the case had been formally appealed, and that, as the result, he called in Gen. Crowder and wrote a certain personal letter to Gen. Crowder, and that the new regulations were formed and designed to take care of Edsel Ford's case by creating a class into which he could fall without too much comment. It is well known that Gen. Crowder, to various draft officers throughout the country, and to prominent citizens, stated that the creation of this new class for Edsel to fall into was not of his own choice.

"The new regulations created five classes, of which class 1 was to be the class in which all men available for service were to be placed. Class 5 was to be deemed permanently exempt; and classes 2, 3, and 4 temporarily exempt (page 1, S. S. R., Form 999). The only class we are concerned with is class 2-a. This class reads:

"Married man with children, or father of motherless children, where such wife or children, or such motherless children, are not mainly dependent on his labor for support, for reason that there are other reasonably certain sources of adequate support, excluding earnings or possible earnings from labor of wife, available, and that the removal of registrant will not deprive such dependents of support.

"Class B was for a married man without children, whose wife either had worked for her support or had a profession or trade to which she could readily return with an opening to support herself.

"A most casual examination of class 2-a will disclose at once the fact that the class does not comply with the wording of the act, or Gen. Crowder's understanding of it, as explained by him in his first report. The wording of the act only permitted the President to exempt 'those in a status with respect to persons dependent on them for support, which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable.'

"As the words in the act were 'dependent upon them for support,' the words in class 2-a are 'mainly dependent for support,' and, in addition, these persons put in 2-a were exempted even though the word 'deferred' was chosen, because class 1 provided 2,800,000 men, and was constantly replenished by new registrants, the work or fight rule, the changing of occupations of men, and the removal of dependents for various causes, and by the constant shifting of the other classes by the boards. In fact, with over 4,000,000 men under arms in war, and not all of class 1 used at its close, with 2,000,000 infantrymen in France, it is highly improbable that the Army could accommodate more than the normal refilling of class 1.

"But the greatest injustice in the eyes of the draft boards was that class 2-a could only, under its wording and under the definition in the second edition S. S. R., Form 999-a, take care of men who themselves, or their wives, were of independent means. In other words, it only provided for a rich man.

"At page 46, S. S. R. second edition, 999-a, class 2-a was defined, and it reads:

"Registrants may claim and may be entitled to deferred classification, class 2, divisions a and b, although wife or children are not mainly dependent on his labor for support.

"This very definition, taken in connection with the circumstances of the case, is a clear evasion of the act of May 18, 1917, and of the Senate's refusal to permit the mere status to itself exempt any registrant.

"The practical effect of this creation of class 2-a was a storm of protest to Gen. Crowder from the draft boards and other persons, and criticism was universal. Many of the draft boards throughout the country refused to classify anybody in it.

"Edsel Ford, immediately on the creation of class 2-a, made a claim to come under it. The claim was denied at once by his local board, despite the law, and he appealed to the district board. The district board, by a vote of 3 to 2, despite the law, granted him the exemption. The three voting on the law, despite their opinions, and the two not caring whether the law was there or not.

"After Edsel's exemption was granted, the class became known in Michigan and elsewhere as the Edsel class instead of 2-a, and the effect was so disastrous upon the draft in Michigan, everybody feeling that they were entitled to get out who were in circumstances like Edsel, that the Government twice ordered an investigation of the Edsel case. One of the investigations came from the Department of the Lakes at Chicago, and finally Adj. Gen. Bersey and Maj. Peterman, his assistant, ordered an investigation to take place in Detroit. Communications concerning Edsel's case were sent to Robert K. Davis and to the district board in Detroit for investigation. While this investigation was pending, Edsel was tendered a commission by the President, and declined it.

"Gen. Crowder, at page 111 of his second report, seeks to justify the creation of class 2-a, where he says that the phrase 'not mainly dependent' included the case of a married man with a wife and children, 'where there was in fact no dependency whatever other than the natural responsibility which attaches to the status of the normal husband and father.'

"It appears to me, in his words Gen. Crowder convicts himself of an evasion of the Senate's refusal to make the status one of exemption in itself, but there is no doubt existing in the minds of those who know Gen. Crowder that he did this under orders.

"It should be remembered in this entire discussion that class 4-a provided for a man whose wife or children are mainly dependent upon his labor for support.

"Edsel Ford had one child and came under 2-a.

"It must be kept clear in a discussion of this kind that 2-a and 3-b are district; that 2-b only raises the question of a married man who, if taken, his wife would have to go to work for her living. None of the boards believed in sending a wife to work for a living. Therefore Gen. Crowder's discussion, at page 114, of where he sent out queries to the boards asking them what they thought of 2-a and b should be disregarded, as their replies lump these two classes together.

"In the discussion the grave injustice done to other married men with children, who had gone to war under the first regulations, or whose cases had been decided under the first regulations, and who were waiting to go to war, will be seen, as this was changed under their very noses while they were in this country. The benefit of this new law, to wit, that a married man with a child, with independent means, should be put in class 2, was not applied in such manner that those who had gone to camps, but who had failed to appeal to the President, would be given the advantage of it, or that those in camps who had failed to appeal to the President could be released, and a storm of protest went up from these men of means, that Edsel Ford should not have the same law applied to him as was applied to them. The figures can be gotten with great exactitude from the tables heretofore quoted, and also given in Crowder's first and second reports.

"The first query that occurs in the discussion above is, why was Edsel's appeal held up? What serious question was in it that it needed to be held up? It was the clearest case that any district board has sent to the President on appeal. This man, of 22 years, traveling south and elsewhere for over six months of each year, with practically no responsibility in the Ford Co. factory, having been connected most of the time with his father in the tractor plant, and with the evidence and opinion of the district board, presented no difficulties on appeal. The appeal should have been promptly sent back so that a great example could have been given to the draft registrants that Edsel Ford could neither delay the decision of his appeal nor get out by any other means.

"The second query presented is why should class 2-a ever have been created? In view of the wording of the act of May 18, 1917, and the fact that the Senate had refused to consider marriage in itself as a cause of exemption, and in the fact that all through the new and the old regulations, and all through every special ruling handed down by Gen. Crowder the fact was kept prominent before all boards that dependency alone was the sole and only test of exemption or deferment.

"I have not the numerous rulings handed down under the first draft before me, as they are not available, but if an investigation is ever held on this question Gen. Crowder's and the President's arguments and ruling during the first draft, as issued in the bulletins by Gen. Crowder, should be looked up on this very question of dependency.

"Under the first draft the sole question was whether a wife and children were or were not dependent upon the husband's labor for support. It was clear from the beginning in the first draft that if a husband or wife had independent means he could not be exempted. But under the first draft the Government even went further, and under the President's express and personal ruling, written, as Gen. Crowder has stated, on his own typewriter, he went so far as to state that even if the relatives of the husband or wife were ready, willing, and able to care for the dependents while the man went to war, then in fact there was no dependency.

"In conclusion I call attention merely to the effect in Michigan of Edsel Ford's exemption. In Appendix, Table 62–a, page 449, second report of Gen. Crowder to the Secretary of War, we find a table of the registration in all the States given and the number placed in class 2. I merely quote a very few States to show how the draft boards in Michigan felt, that if Edsel was given the benefit of class 2, all others should be given it, and the fact that registrants were not ashamed to claim class 2 when they found that Edsel was put in it. In other States draft boards did not regard class 2–a seriously, and registrants were ashamed to claim the Edsel class.

"In Alabama there were 206,248 registrants, and 20,850 were in class 2.

"In Michigan there were 411,000 registrants, and 84,601 in class 2.

"In New York there were 1,120,332 registrants, and 74,715 in class 2, or 10,000 less than Michigan, with practically three times the registration.

"In Pennsylvania there were 902,996 registrants, and 79,794 in class 2.

"In Wisconsin 266,691 registrants, and 24,392 in class 2.

"In Ohio 617,371 registrants, and 47,467 in class 2.

"In California 332,593 registrants, and 13,177 in class 2.

"Massachusetts, 398,364 registrants, or practically that of Michigan, and 31,330 in class 2.

"Appendix at page 401 should also be examined into."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 15, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, give us, we beseech Thee, the courage, the strength, the fortitude to cast out the demons which are lying in wait to enter and corrode the soul of man, such as egotism, covetousness, jealousy, hate, revenge, and all that brood of vipers which follow in their wake; that we may develop the angels of love and good will.

"Love never faileth; but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away.

"For we know in part, and we prophesy in part.

"But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

"When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

"For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.

"And now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; but the greatest of these is love."

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, the highest privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, during the debate yesterday on the prohibition enforcement bill, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] used the following language, which appears on page 2572 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday, July 14, 1919, to wit:

> Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first two words. I am opposed to this amendment unless the gentleman from Kentucky will provide that the inspector and agents visit the House Office Building. Then I will vote for his amendment. Before this debate is concluded I shall ask that every Member of Congress who votes dry on this proposition be honest to his country and his conscience and that he place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the amount of liquor that he has saved up for himself either in his home or in his office. * * * If the Congress wants to be on the level with the country, it will do as I ask. * * * The country is told that this Congress is overwhelmingly dry. I have been a Member of this Congress since 1914, and I have found it overwhelmingly wet. Now, why—why, in the days when you are making the world safe for democracy and freedom—why tie up the individual unless you are willing, Members of Congress, to tie up yourselves? I have heard, Mr. Chairman, of Members of this House who have said that they have in their private wine cellars enough liquor to take care of them and their friends for 20 years.

Mr. Speaker, I submit respectfully that this is a reflection upon the integrity and the standing of every Member of this Congress. It gives out to the world—and so the morning papers report—that while the Members of Congress are seeking to place prohibition upon the people of the country the Members of this House have stored away, even in their offices in the House Office Building, a Government institution, if you please, enough liquor to last 20 years for the private use of themselves and their friends.

I submit that it is an unwarranted aspersion upon the standing and the integrity and the dignity of this House, whose Members are as strictly sober as any 435 men with whom I have ever been associated before.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think, on the question of what is the privilege of the House, that there is a line of wavering degree. The Chair is disposed to think that the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] were not an assault upon the privileges of this House and that the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the Chair recognize me to offer a motion to expunge those unwarranted and unfair remarks from the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. The House has its remedy for that.

Mr. BLANTON. You can not do it in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not a question of privilege.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. , being a bill "making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes"; that the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with; that there shall be two hours of general debate, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]; that at the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read; that on the reading of the bill no amendment shall be in order except germane amendments to the following paragraph, which paragraph is made in order on page 19 of said bill:

"Vocational rehabilitation: For an additional amount for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved June 27, 1918, as amended, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, $6,000,000, of which sum not exceeding $15,000 may be expended for rent of quarters in the District of Columbia if space is not provided in Government-owned buildings by the Public Buildings Commission: Provided, That no person (except the members of the Federal Board for Vocational Education) shall be paid by said board out of the appropriation contained in this or any other act at a rate of compensation exceeding $2,500 per annum and rates above that sum, except not to exceed the following: One at $6,000, 2 at $5,000 each, 28 in excess of $3,500 and not in excess of $4,000 each, 27 at $3,500 each, 70 at $3,000 each, 60 at $2,750 each, and 100 at $2,500 each."

That at the conclusion of the reading of said bill it shall be reported to the House with such amendments as may be made to the paragraph specified as being subject to amendments. Thereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman this: What do we want with any two hours' debate on this thing?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, suggested two hours of general debate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are we going to debate?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I assume to make some explanation of the hearings that were held, covering a period of more than 12 hours and covering some 150 to 200 pages on this general subject. I assume that it is for the purpose of making an explanation to the House of the paragraphs that are made in order on the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to me every man in the House knows what this proposition is, and every man in the House has made up his mind on it, and every man should vote to sustain the veto.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The time need not be consumed if the Members do not desire to use it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kansas or the Speaker, one or the other, or both, what about the veto? We are not going to take this thing up before we vote on the veto, are we?

Mr. GOOD. The veto message has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations and is still in that committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but you have got to vote on it.

Mr. GOOD. Not necessarily.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The veto message defeats the bill, if the House does not reconsider it. The Committee on Appropriations have reported out a new bill with a new number for the consideration of the House, and have taken it up de novo.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is the same old bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; but it is introduced under a new number and is to be considered de novo in the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not imperative to vote on the veto?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The veto message came to the House. The Constitution provides that there shall be consideration of the bill. The House referred the message and bill to the committee. Now, if the committee brings out a bill in accord with the suggestion of the President's veto and the House passes it in that form, it seems to the Chair action on the veto itself is not required. The Chair will look that up.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How do we come to be considering this proposition now when no attention is paid to the veto?

The SPEAKER. The veto message, with the bill, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Now, that committee has reported out a new bill. The veto message and the original bill are still slumbering in the Committee on Appropriations, and the Chair thinks——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to me this way, if the Chair will permit: We pass a bill in due form and the President vetoes it, and the veto is the only excuse that we have for going into this proposition that is brought in here by the chairman of the Committee on Rules. It seems to me the Constitution is imperative. It says that when the President returns a bill to the House in which it originated with his veto, immediately the House shall reconsider the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. Now, for the sake of convenience, in days gone by the House has juggled with that word "immediately," and I am not insisting on the liberal dictionary meaning of it now. They have postponed action from time to time, and some of the veto messages were sent to committee and never reported back.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that the action of the House in voting to refer the bill, with the veto, to the Committee on Appropriations is not such reconsideration as is contemplated by the constitutional provision?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, no. The constitutional provision means that you shall consider that veto and pass on it, and the only excuse that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and his confreres have for bringing in this rule is that the veto ought to be disposed of first.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the Constitution simply require that the bill which is vetoed shall be reconsidered?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course it does, but it has never been reconsidered; and the Constitution provides, further, for the calling of the roll, and those in favor of reconsideration vote yea and those opposed to it vote nay, and it is the only place in our system of government where you must call the roll. There has been no constitutional disposition of it at all. The roll has not been called.

Mr. DUPRÉ. We have got two sundry civil bills before the House at one time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So the upshot of the whole thing, as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] suggests sotto voce, is that we have two sundry civil bills before us at one time, or will have if this rule reported by the gentleman from Kansas prevails.

Mr. DUPRÉ. They have introduced another sundry civil bill, with the veto pending.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We have another sundry civil bill introduced, with the veto pending, as the gentleman from Louisiana says.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Then, if the House should override the veto of the President, the bill would be passed?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course. As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] suggests, if the House should override the veto, why, then there would not be a particle of sense in this performance introduced here by the gentleman from Kansas. It would be an absolute superfluity.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will look at paragraph 105 of the Manual, he will see that a motion to refer a vetoed bill, either with or without the veto message, has been held allowable and within the constitutional mandate that "the House shall proceed to reconsider." I think the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], when he occupied the high place of Speaker of the House in the Sixty-fifth Congress, followed that precedent in the case of a vetoed bill by suggesting that a motion to refer was within the direction of the Constitution that it should be reconsidered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The question never was raised when I was Speaker, and I want it understood once more that I am not bound as a Member of the House by what I did as Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. I think that may be fortunate for the present House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the decisions on this point are clear. In Hinds' Precedents, section 3550, it says:

A motion to refer a vetoed bill, either with or without the message, has been held allowable within the constitutional mandate that the House "shall proceed to reconsider."

And, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] states, there have been many cases where bills have been referred to a committee and no further action has been taken upon them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Chair will permit, that was simply to get rid of the bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the reason of the rule and the reason of the constitutional mandate are fully observed by the action that was taken in this case. Of course, the purpose is that the President's will shall receive the consideration of the House. If the House by a two-thirds vote overrules the President's veto, that defeats the will of the President, and therefore it is provided that that shall be done by a roll call; but in the present instance the committee, as the Chair is advised, have reported, conformably with the suggestion of the President, a new bill, so that all the House has to do, if it does not desire to act in accord with the President, is to defeat the bill which now comes forth, and that defeat can be accomplished, not by a two-thirds vote but by a majority vote, so that in this case the purpose of the Constitution to allow the will of the President to be expressed is being carried out more completely than by the technical yea-and-nay vote, upon which two-thirds are required. At any rate, the precedents fully justify the action of the committee. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the Chair——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think after the Chair has ruled there should be further discussion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the Chair a new question. What becomes of the direction in the Constitution that there shall be a yea-and-nay vote on it?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair said, it has been decided a number of times that by referring the bill to the committee no further action need be taken upon it. It has been decided by a long course of precedents, as the gentleman from Missouri is aware. The committee can report it back and then when the bill is before the House it requires a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. WINGO. If the logic of the Speaker is correct, would not we find ourselves in this situation: You dispose of the veto of the President without a record vote of the House, and would not you dispose of the veto by a majority vote instead of a two-thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. If the House wants to bring the veto before it, all it has to do is to discharge the committee.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recognized to make a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor on the rule.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not a privileged motion? That is the subject matter of the President's veto; we are acting on a constitutional matter, and is it not true that the highest privileged motion is in order at any time during the proceedings?

The SPEAKER. Exactly; but that is not now before the House. The President's veto and the bill are in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WINGO. The committee brings in a new bill, which is not privileged, which makes this rule necessary, and is it not a matter of higher privilege to move to discharge the committee, and has it not been so decided?

The SPEAKER. That might be, if the gentleman had the floor, but the question before the House now is on the rule.

Mr. WINGO. If that be true, you can defeat a question of the highest privilege by the Rules Committee coming in and cutting that out. So that a motion of the highest privilege would be set aside by one not of the highest privilege. In other words, you would hold that the rules of the House supersede the Constitution, which I contend is not logical.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the Committee on Rules having submitted this privileged rule, if any gentleman wishes to make a motion suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas, that can be brought before the House by voting down the rule.

Mr. WINGO. The only desire I have is for orderly procedure. Would not that be doing in an indirect way what we might do directly; would it not be a better parliamentary procedure, and be safer, and resolve all doubts in favor of the construction of the Constitution to pass first on the veto? Frankly, I should vote against passing it over the President's veto, but I think we ought to go very carefully and be sure to carry out the constitutional mandate. Would it not be a quicker procedure to pass on the President's veto and then if we override the President's veto that settles it. If the House fails to do that, the Rules Committee can bring in this rule and make the new bill in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes that there is much merit in what the gentleman says, but the Chair thinks that this accomplishes the very purpose the gentleman himself says he desires, and that is that the President's veto shall not be overruled. This motion accomplishes the same end without calling for a vote on the President's veto. It simply eliminates one step in the proceeding. It seems to the Chair that this is the quicker way to accomplish that very end. It may have been that when the President's veto was up it would have been better that the House should have voted upon it, but then if the House had failed to sustain the President's veto it would have gone to the committee and then come back just as it comes in now. That was not done; the original bill is not before the House, but is in committee. It seems to the Chair that while that might have been a more orderly manner, yet this has precedents and support and accomplishes the same end and eliminates one step.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DEWALT. Is not this an attempt to sustain the President's veto by the action of the committee in reporting a bill consonant with the President's views instead of either sustaining the veto by a vote of the House or rejecting it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KINCHELOE. In case the rule is defeated, what is the method of procedure for securing a vote on the presidential veto?

The SPEAKER. The committee could report it out or the House could discharge the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations having had referred to them the sundry civil appropriation bill with the President's veto, took the President's veto as final on that bill, and asked the Committee on Rules for a rule for the consideration of a new bill providing for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the ensuing year, and this resolution is to make that bill in order. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina how much time he desires on the rule.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I suggest 20 minutes on a side. I have had some requests for time that I did not have when I first spoke to the gentleman about this.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent that debate upon the rule be limited to 40 minutes, 20 minutes to be controlled by myself and 20 minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that debate on this rule be limited to 40 minutes, 20 minutes to be controlled by himself and 20 minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I make a further request for unanimous consent that at the end of the 40 minutes the previous question be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask a question on this proposition. The rule as brought in by the Committee on Rules provides for two hours of general debate, one half of that time to be controlled by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the other half by the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations. Did the Committee on Rules take into consideration the fairness and equity of that, in view of the situation and the conflict of opinion, and consider at all the question of allowing any of that time to be controlled by the chairman of the Committee on Education, which committee is primarily interested in this proposition?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Education is a member of the Committee on Rules and was present when this rule was considered. He then made no suggestion other than the usual suggestion as to the division of time between the majority and the minority members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving further the right to object, I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Rules if he would consider the propriety of himself offering an amendment to the rule giving those who may be opposed to the amendment brought in by the Committee on Appropriations an opportunity to control at least a part of this time? We have no assurance, in view of the language of the rule, that those of us who may desire to oppose the amendment will be given any consideration whatever in this debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, in response to the request of the gentleman from Alabama, I would say that it has been customary in cases of this kind for both the minority and majority members of the committee having the bill in charge to yield time to any Member of the House who may be especially interested in the measure under consideration, either for or against, and I assume that that arrangement can readily be made in this case.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Reverting to the statement about no request being made in the Committee on Rules, I recognized the usual custom of the two sides of the aisle being given the control of the time, and the equity that is always shown to Members who are for or against the bill under consideration. For that reason I took it for granted that there would be no advantage taken on either side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is always the assumption in the Committee on Rules that there will be a fair division of time between those opposing and those favoring the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The only bill to be considered now is the new bill that has been introduced?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. That bill is not printed so that the Members of the House may have access to it or have a copy of it, and I submit the point of order to the Speaker that it should be out of order to consider legislation when the membership of the House has not had the privilege of seeing a copy of the legislation which we are to consider.

The SPEAKER. It may be that perhaps it would be well that that should be in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it in order to object to the consideration of this until the bill is printed?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Perhaps it should be, but it is not.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not printed, and we can not get a copy of it.

Mr. CANNON. This rule settles it. That is what the rule is for.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. I notice in the reading of the rule that there was no number given the bill under consideration. Is it necessary that a number be given to the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The number will be given by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk reported the bill as H. R. 7343.

Mr. GARD. I did not hear it reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules has brought in this rule for the consideration of the bill, providing for the reading of the bill without amendments, except germane amendments to the provision providing for the educational rehabilitation of our returned soldiers. This is the only unusual feature of this rule. We justify ourselves before the House for that unusual provision of the rule by the fact that the House has recently considered the sundry civil appropriation bill in its entirety as it is contained in the bill made in order by this rule, with the exception of the provision to which amendments are made in order. Otherwise the rule is not unusual. We made this provision in order to expedite the passage of this very important measure. The activities of the Government are practically suspended. Many of the activities of the Government that are now under operation are in operation in violation of law, and it is a very serious question whether or not the action taken by many of the departments of the Government within the last few days will not be entirely unlawful and so declared by the courts if the question be raised. It is for the purpose of making ample provision for the rehabilitation of our disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines and provision for the operation of the Government that we are anxious to expedite the passage of this bill, and therefore we bring this rule in as now provided.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the President vetoed the sundry civil appropriation bill because of the inadequacy of the appropriation to continue the great work of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. In response to the veto of the President the Committee on Appropriations held supplemental hearings and has reported legislation the consideration of which is provided for by the rule which the House is now considering. As this was a unanimous report from the Committee on Appropriations, I imagine that the objections set forth in the President's veto have been satisfied. This vocational education should not be made the subject of too rigid economy. The work of this board is something of which every American ought to be proud. [Applause.] These wounded soldiers should be liberally dealt with. Every one of them should have $100 a month while he is being educated. Those with families should receive more. If this legislation does not satisfy the objection raised by the President's veto, I imagine that we will hear from the President again. Inasmuch as this is a unanimous report and inasmuch as the officers of the Federal Board for Vocational Education have appeared before the Committee on Appropriations, let us hope that this legislation is such that this board can continue its benign work to the end that every one of these wounded soldiers may be given an education such as he prefers by the Government of the United States at governmental expense. [Applause.] I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves 17 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the rule.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I trust the House in its anxiety to proceed will not set a precedent that may rise to plague us in the future. The committee has reported a new bill, and it frankly admits this is a new bill, and bringing in this rule has admitted it is not a question of privilege, and it is accompanied by the remarkable statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. I desire the House to consider that statement when it comes to vote on this rule. As I now recall the statement—and if I do not quote the gentleman correctly he can correct me—he said that the Committee on Appropriations treated the veto of the President as final. By what authority does any committee of this House treat a veto of the President as final?

Under the Constitution it is made our duty to determine whether a veto of the President is final, and the only jurisdiction—the gentleman will find precedents, although I have not time now to call attention to them—the only jurisdiction the Committee on Appropriations had was to make recommendations to the House whether or not it should sustain the President's veto. Now, the orderly procedure for this House to do and for the committee to have done would have been to have reported back the vetoed bill, not the new bill, but reported back the vetoed bill with recommendation to the House as to whether or not it would advise the House to sustain or reject the President's veto. That is the orderly procedure, gentlemen. If you do not adopt that procedure, you will find yourself coming to this conclusion, that the rules of the House——

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. WINGO. Let me finish my statement. I repeat, if we follow the present proposed procedure, if you let the statement of the gentleman from Kansas go as final as the action of this House that the committee, and not the House, under the Constitution shall determine whether or not the veto of the President is final, you establish a dangerous precedent, and you establish that the rules of this House are superior to the Constitution. The only people who can treat the veto of the President as final is the Congress through solemn proceeding. You must act upon a roll call. Suppose we adopt this procedure to-day and pass this new bill. This House will never carry out the constitutional mandate to pass upon a President's veto. What will happen? I imagine from the reading of this text that the gentlemen are going to get around one of the objections of the President. I am not prepared to say now whether I shall vote to do that. I will be frank to say that I am strongly tempted to do that. As I heard the reading of the proposed amendment they propose to get around one of the objections of the President by changing the limitation. In other words, the House then will by a majority vote override the President's veto and put up to him a second time that which the President has vetoed once. Gentlemen, we can not afford to do that. I am in sympathy with the President's veto. We all want to get quick action. Now, let us vote down this rule. And I shall move, if I can get recognition, to discharge the committee from further consideration. Then call the roll and I will vote to sustain the veto of the President. Then there will be no objection made to the unanimous consent for the gentleman from Iowa to bring in the new bill, but if there is objection, then the Committee on Rules can make it in order and the House can preserve an orderly procedure.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the rule is this: When a veto message of the President is submitted that any Member of the House has the right to refer that message with the bill to the proper committee, and any other Member of the House who is in favor of passing the bill notwithstanding the President's veto has perfect right to offer a motion to pass the bill notwithstanding the veto, but if no Member——

Mr. WINGO. I think the House has acted properly in line with the precedents. It can refer any question to a committee for recommendation. The House by its procedure referred the veto message to the committee for its recommendation, and that committee ought to come back to this House with the recommendation that it either sustain or vote down the recommendation of the President. If we sustain the veto, then we can bring in a new rule and preserve the constitutional procedure.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I shall not permit the observation of the gentleman from Arkansas to pass without notice. The gentleman is very much exercised because the veto of the President was not challenged by the Members of the House and voted upon. There was an opportunity for that vote when the message arrived and was submitted to the House.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. When I conclude the statement. The House observed the practice that has been in vogue for more than a century and that was observed within the past two years in this House. The President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, on the 22d day of August, 1916, vetoed a public land bill. That bill, together with the veto, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and those two measures, the bill and the veto, still lie slumbering in the Committee on Public Lands without a vote or any action whatever on the part of the House on the veto.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And the gentleman from Arkansas, I believe, was a member of that committee.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Just as soon as I refer to another bill and veto.

Mr. WINGO. My question was on the other matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman think it sufficient answer to say that a former Congress failing to obey a constitutional mandate to go on record on a presidential veto justifies this Congress doing it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think the former Congress observed the law and the rules of the House in the action it took.

Mr. WINGO. If we take this procedure to-day, will the gentleman tell me what will become of the President's veto?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Exactly the same thing that became of the President's veto on the Army appropriation bill. On August 18, 1916, that bill, together with the veto message of the President, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and four days later a bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs making appropriation for the Army and passed the House without a record vote. The gentleman from Arkansas was then a Member of the House.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is reciting past history. I am asking what will happen now? Will we ever have a vote on the President's veto under the Constitution if we follow your procedure?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; no more than we had a vote on the veto when the President vetoed the Army bill and the land bill in 1916. If the House had decided to challenge the veto of the President on the Army appropriation bill of 1916, the vote would have been taken immediately by roll call. If the House had desired to challenge the veto message of the President on the land bill, it would have done so by a record vote immediately upon the veto message being laid before the House together with the bill. In this case the House Committee on Appropriations has accepted, and the House is about to accept, the veto message of the President as final so far as the sundry civil bill is concerned, and is reporting out a new bill, according to precedent, providing for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the next year.

Mr. WINGO. The Chair ruled otherwise to what the gentleman has stated. Objection was made the other day and the Chair overruled the gentleman's objection and insisted, over the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] had a right to move to refer it to the committee. So it was challenged at that time, and the Chair ruled, and very properly, that we had a right to ask for a recommendation of our committee before we acted on the veto of the President.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The House acted entirely within its rights in referring the bill and the message to the Committee on Appropriations. We could have voted down that motion. Then the vote would have been taken on the veto message of the President.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL].

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, of course I think it is a real recognized fact that this whole procedure is just simply a subterfuge of the majority side of the House to keep from going to direct vote on the President's veto message.

Now, I do not blame my friends on the other side of the House very much for trying to "duck" this issue, to use a slang expression. Our friends in the majority, in preparing legislation to take care of wounded and disabled soldiers, evidently did not take proper precaution in the way of appropriations to do that. The President called the attention of the country and of the House to the fact that the majority had been negligent in that regard. And I believe it was upon yesterday that the Republican House sustained a veto of the President. Naturally the majority does not want to get into the daily habit of having the Republican majority on the floor of the House sustaining the vetoes of the President. It is a fact that this whole procedure, the Committee on Rules coming in here with a rule to-day, is almost exactly what the President demands; but the orderly procedure, as pointed out by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], would have been much better. It would have been a more manly way to have met the situation to have disposed of the veto message and then come in with a rule and then with the bill and have passed it in the regular way.

Of course, the gentlemen on that side are responsible for the legislation. I am sorry that they did not measure up to the requirements when they had an opportunity to provide sufficient money to take care of disabled soldiers.

It devolved upon the Democratic President to use the great power of the veto to bring the majority side to its senses. And, of course, I congratulate my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, for his ingenuity and wisdom in mapping out a course that will prevent his side from going to record on a fair show on a roll call, as practically every man on that side would vote to sustain President Wilson on this veto. I think the country is familiar with the situation, but I simply wanted to emphasize the fact and call the attention of the public to the way in which they are undertaking to get around and not meet the issue.

It is a well-known fact that every man in the military and naval service of the country and their friends should bear in mind that if it had not been for the veto power exercised by President Wilson the Republican Party would not have given the soldiers and sailors the recourse to which they are entitled. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANTRILL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The Democratic House of Representatives passed the sundry civil bill and it went to the Senate. It did not become a law.

Mr. UPSHAW. Why?

Mr. CANNON. That bill made no more favorable disposition for vocational education than does this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] Claptrap! Claptrap! [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois that the Senate had no chance to pass upon the bill because of a filibuster by the Republican Senators, who not only killed this bill but many other bills, which required an extra session of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. But if the gentleman will yield further——

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. A Democratic Congress, in February or early in March, passed a sundry civil bill with a less provision than is contained in the bill we passed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANTRILL. Just a moment. May I have one minute more?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANTRILL. I would like to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LAYTON. Just one question.

Mr. CANTRILL. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I will state that a Democratic House did pass all the requirements demanded by the department at that time when the bill was under consideration. The demands are much larger now than they were then.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman yield? The gentleman does not want to make a misstatement, I am sure. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANTRILL. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that he is mistaken about that. The estimates made for this service in the regular Book of Estimates were for $4,000,000, and the only appropriation made by the last Congress for this purpose, a Democratic Congress, was $2,000,000. This Congress has already appropriated $6,000,000 for this purpose, and this bill carries $8,000,000 more. Those are the facts in the case. Post up! Get the facts! [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANTRILL. These differences could easily have been worked out between the two Houses if the filibuster had not occurred. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. Post up! Post up! [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, how does the time stand?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has 15 minutes, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has 5 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How many more speeches has the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. POU. One speech of five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I wish the gentleman from North Carolina would use his time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I care nothing at all about the question as to whether this vocational bill as now proposed to be amended was passed by the House and failed in the Senate, nor do I care what the provisions are, so far as the amount in the bill is concerned, because that is water that has passed by the mill. The question before us, and to my mind the important question, is an orderly manner of proceeding, and with due deference to the decision of the Speaker I maintain that this rule being now considered is not in order.

Now, what are my reasons therefor? In the first place, I do not think anyone will contradict the basic proposition that when a bill is vetoed by the President of the United States it must be returned to the House in which it originated, with the veto message, and immediately thereafter it shall be considered and a vote is to be taken as to whether the bill shall pass, notwithstanding the objections thereto. That, as the ex-Speaker, Mr. CLARK, has already said, has been construed to mean that the consideration can be postponed even indefinitely.

Now, what has been done here? When this veto message came into the House with the bill attached thereto it was by the House referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Now, what does the Committee on Appropriations do? It comes back to the House with what? With a new bill, not with the old bill, not with the bill which was to be voted upon and determined upon as to whether it should be passed by a two-thirds vote, notwithstanding the objections of the President, but with an entirely new bill, so far as we know. Therefore I maintain that, although it is said that this new bill is in consonance with the objections of the President of the United States, it is sustaining the veto of the President by the action of a committee, and when that committee reports the bill to the House the House can vote upon it, and by a majority vote determine that the sustainment of the veto by the President shall be maintained.

Now, that is clearly, if there be anything of force in the language of the Constitution, a violation of the provisions of the Constitution. It deprives the House of voting by a two-thirds vote on the veto message, and gives the right to the House to affirm that message or negative that message by a majority vote. If you get beyond that, you get beyond the Constitution itself. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the use of poison gas in warfare was first undertaken by the Huns at the beginning of the Great War. It has never so far received the sanction of the civilized world. But there seems to be a disposition in certain quarters to adapt those tactics to legislative discussion, and so we have a variety of gas explosions here this morning in regard to a matter that is as clear as any feature of the procedure of the House of Representatives. Gentlemen attempt to establish smoke barrages, behind which they hope to conceal their real partisan purpose and intent.

Now, the fact is that there are three motions that can be made when the President returns a bill with his veto—a motion to consider forthwith, a motion to postpone to a day certain, and a motion to refer to committee. And all those motions have been made from time to time since the foundation of the Government, and this is the first time, so far as I know, that anyone has ever raised a question in regard to the validity of any of them.

If the gentlemen on the other side who are agonizing because the House did not do the perfectly senseless thing of voting on a veto message relative to a provision which it expected to amend, practically in accordance with the recommendations of the President, had felt that way when the matter first came before us, they could have either made the motion for immediate consideration or they could have voted down the motion to refer to the committee. They did not even ask for a division. So far as the RECORD shows, the action of the House was unanimous, as I recall it, on the motion to refer to committee—a motion very frequently made; a motion made on that side within the last two years with regard to a great supply bill providing for the Army of the Union. It went to the committee, and exactly the same practice was followed as was followed in that case, when my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], was in the chair as Speaker, and when a great majority of the men now sitting on that side were here as Representatives in the former Congress, as has been followed in this case.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What was done with the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. It was taken up for consideration, and it was considered, just as this bill will be considered. The only reason why any rule is necessary in this case is to expedite the consideration of this bill. We happen to be operating under another rule, which makes it difficult to get in even with a privileged bill from the Committee on Appropriations. Furthermore, this bill has not been printed, and therefore could not be considered until to-morrow without a rule. Therefore, in order to serve the public interest and have this bill reenacted as soon as possible, it has been necessary to bring in a rule; and the minority members of the Committee on Rules used very good judgment and patriotism in the Committee on Rules by voting for the rule, as they have shown their very poor judgment since the rule was reported. They have proceeded to argue now for the first time the new and strange heresy propounded by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, 21 Members seconded the demand.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-one Members, not a sufficient number.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for the other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the other side. Those opposed to taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety in the negative. Twenty-one is not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The resolution is agreed to, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7343) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has one hour, and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], has one hour. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GOOD. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we are about to consider a bill providing for the sundry civil expenses of the Government in lieu of a similar bill vetoed by the President. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], will make a statement with regard to the details of the paragraph toward which the presidential veto was leveled. I do not propose to discuss that matter in detail, but propose to discuss for a very few moments the general question of this particular veto.

The sundry civil bill was signed by the presiding officers of the two Houses on the 1st day of July. The President did not act upon it until the 11th, by the veto, which arrived here on the morning of the 12th. He vetoed the bill on the ground that the appropriation of $6,000,000 for vocational rehabilitation was not sufficient, and that there were certain limitations contained in that item upon the amount which might be paid for high salaries, which he claimed would hamper the work of rehabilitation under the paragraph.

We are none of us challenging the President's constitutional right to veto legislation. It is not only his right to do it, but it is his duty to do it when he feels justified in taking that extraordinary action. But so far as my experience goes, this is the most extraordinary and unusual presidential veto we have ever had. There may have been presidential vetoes in the past on the ground that a certain item of appropriation was not sufficient, where the right to create a deficiency was unquestioned, but I do not recall any such veto, and I doubt if there ever has been such a veto up to this time.

There may have been presidential vetoes in the past on the ground that Congress was not providing for salaries sufficiently high, but if there have been I do not recall them. I do not know of a case, have not been able to find a case, where a President has vetoed a bill on the ground that the Congress has not provided large enough salaries. These are the two grounds of the veto before us. If the bill had not been vetoed, no one has any doubt but that the work of vocational rehabilitation would have been carried on in the largest possible and most liberal way, because every dollar of the $6,000,000 carried in the bill was available for use as soon as it was needed and when it was needed.

The right to create a deficiency was unquestioned, and if the $6,000,000 had been needed within a month or two months or three months it could have been used, and Congress would have responded promptly and willingly to any request for a deficiency appropriation to carry on the work. It is true that with regard to these gentlemen whose salaries were about to be reduced they might have been temporarily separated from the public crib and pay roll, some of them, or their salaries of $5,000 and $4,000 and $3,500 might have been reduced somewhat, temporarily at least, until such time as the President might have communicated with the Congress, calling attention to the necessity, as he saw it, if he did see it, to increase the salaries of these officials. No President, so far as I recall, has ever vetoed an appropriation bill because of the alleged insufficiency of an item where a deficiency could be legally created, and no President, so far as I know, has ever heretofore vetoed a bill on the ground that the salaries provided were not high enough.

If it be true that this appropriation is not sufficient for the entire fiscal year, that matter would have been provided for by a deficiency appropriation. If it be true that some of these gentlemen are entitled to $5,000 instead of $4,000, or to $3,500 rather than the $800 or $1,000 or $1,200 that they used to earn in their usual vocations, that fact could have been presented to Congress without the veto of a great supply bill. During the period of the Great War we passed Army and Navy bills that carried but a fraction of the sums needed and used for military and naval purposes, but were any of those bills ever vetoed on the ground that the appropriation was not great enough? The ordinary appropriation bills carried hundreds of millions of dollars. The deficiency appropriations for this same service carried tens of billions of dollars. The President must know and the President does know that through a deficiency appropriation all needed funds would have been provided for, without the extraordinary action of vetoing this tremendously important supply bill.

This Congress in 37 working days passed through both Houses, securing the signing by the presiding officers of the two Houses, seven great bills that had failed in the preceding Congress. The President was not at the seat of government and could not sign them, and from the 1st of July up to the time action was finally taken on these bills practically every activity of the Federal Government was in dire jeopardy lest something might occur to prevent the enactment of these bills into law. Until the President acted, the multiplied activities provided for under this bill, from Panama to Hawaii, from the Arctic to the Virgin Islands, were in questionable circumstances, and still all these activities would have been validated had the President signed the bill.

But when he failed to sign it, these activities, wide flung as are our possessions on land and sea, involving the employment of hundreds of thousands of people, in the most important services under the flag, were left without legal sanction, and to-day so far as they have operated from the 1st of July have been operating without warrant or sanction of law, a condition which has never existed under our flag from the foundation of the Government to this time.

What are some of these activities? The Panama Canal and all of the work on and in and about it; the activities of the Alien Property Custodian; the maintenance of all the Federal penitentiaries; the Coast and Geodetic Survey; the Coast Guard; the Emergency Fleet Corporation as provided for in this bill; the Federal Trade Commission; the great work of flood control along the Mississippi and on the Sacramento Rivers; the activities of the Geological Survey and the Lighthouse Service; many of the most important activities of the Bureau of Labor; all of the activities of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; the National Park Service and all of the wide-flung public-land services; the Reclamation Service; the work on rivers and harbors as provided for in this bill and on public buildings from one end of the country to the other; the maintenance of St. Elizabeths Hospital, where 4,000 of our unfortunate boys are being cared for; and the maintenance of soldiers' homes throughout the country.

By reason of the veto of this bill all of these activities, so far as they are being carried on, are now absolutely without any warrant of law so far as employments are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Can I have five minutes more?

Mr. GOOD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. This bill carries an appropriation of $53,000,000 for military and naval family allowances of soldiers; $75,000,000 for military and naval compensation of soldiers and their families. Not a dollar of these sums can now be legally paid. Not a dollar of them has been paid legally so far as it has been paid since the 1st of July. But in order that the Congress may have its attention called to the salaries of a few gentlemen who do not want to be separated from the public crib, in order that the attention of the country might be called to the fact that there is a possibility of a deficiency six or eight months from now in one item, all of these great appropriations for our soldiers and our sailors, their wives, widows, and orphans, are nullified, held up, deprived of legal sanction.

Why, even the flunkies at the doors of the White House are employed, and have been since the 1st of July, by reason of this veto without warrant of law. If there is anybody being paid there now he is being paid contrary to law and employed contrary to law.

If the Panama Canal is carrying commerce to-day it is doing it without legal sanction for expenditures. If they are taking seals at the Pribilof Islands they are doing it without warrant of law. If they are surveying lands for settlement they are doing it without warrant of law. If they are paying the widows and orphans of soldiers and the crippled soldiers themselves they are doing it without warrant of law.

I would regret to express on the floor of this House my honest opinion as to the motives, purposes, and intent of this absolutely unnecessary and unjustifiable veto of a great appropriation bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] Tying up the activities of the country everywhere for the alleged cure of something that is curable, if it needs cure, through the ordinary processes of the Government and without recourse to this revolutionary procedure. If the President had been at the seat of government when this bill was passed and had wanted to veto it, it might have been done without creating this condition of chaos and confusion. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is cheered by his side of the House when he says that it is an unnecessary veto. Why did not the gentleman move to pass it over the President's veto? [Applause on the Democratic side.] If it is such a clear case as the gentleman says it is, and wholly unnecessary, why did not the gentleman give us the opportunity to pass it over the veto?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Texas is a very shrewd, smart, astute gentleman, and he does not believe in this veto any more than I do. In his heart of hearts he knows there is such a thing as taking advantage of an opportunity to appear to be doing something for folks when you are not doing it. That is the answer to his question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the speech just delivered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] would have been a very good speech opposing this veto, but it comes too late. The trouble is that the gentlemen on the Republican side of this House who passed this bill originally over our insistence to increase the appropriation to rehabilitate our crippled soldiers did not want to toe the mark and vote on the question of the veto, because the President's veto is right and proper. That is all there is to this hullabaloo here to-day; merely that and nothing more.

I am more in favor of this veto than I have been of any veto message the President ever sent to this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am in favor of doing everything possible for the comfort and prosperity of the American soldiers, especially those who are wounded or crippled in battle. There was nothing secret about this thing. This is not the first time that a message was ever referred to a committee, but the case that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] cited is not parallel to this. That message that he was talking about was referred to the Committee on Public Lands for the purpose of killing it in the committee. Nobody had any idea of killing this veto, and it ought to have been put on its passage and those who were in favor of it given a chance to vote to uphold the veto.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What was the reason for referring the President's veto of the Army appropriation bill in 1916?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not remember. There are lots of things that I do not carry about in my head.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In that case the veto message, together with the bill vetoed, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and four days later a new bill was reported back and passed without a roll call.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true. I do not remember the circumstances of the case.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a parallel of this case.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The principal part of the speech of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is a whine against the President of the United States. His objection or criticism divides itself into two parts. The first is that the President went to Europe and the second that he vetoed the bill. I am going to give my opinion about both matters. The President of the United States had as much right to go to Europe as he had to go to Baltimore. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I said that from the start. There had grown up in this country the delusion that the President of the United States could not go outside of the country, and when President Taft and Gen. Diaz met on the bridge at El Paso, and each one stood on his own side of the fence and they had some kind of a confabulation down there—that performance confirmed that delusion in the minds of the American people. The gentleman from Kansas has a bill or a resolution or something of the sort providing that no President of the United States shall leave this country. I suggest to him that he is locking the barn after the horse has gone. [Laughter.] No other President except President Wilson ever went to Europe or anywhere else outside of the country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And never will.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Maybe never will, but that resolution or bill—which is it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of the gentleman from Kansas is not intended to be passed. It is intended to be an indirect assault on Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me tell you something that I remember that happened some years ago. When I think of it it makes me wonder that the gentleman from Kansas did not bring in a resolution censuring Woodrow Wilson for leaving the United States, because he, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, when Col. Roosevelt was in the very zenith of his power and fame, had the courage to stand up here on the floor of the House and take President Roosevelt's hide off in pieces as big as a saddle skirt, and when he got through with that speech I told him that if it were proper for Congress to do so, if Congress had any jurisdiction over the case at all, I would be glad to move that Marshall Ney's name be stricken out of history as the bravest of the brave and the name of the gentleman from Kansas inserted in its place. [Laughter and applause.] Why did not the gentleman live up to the reputation for courage that I have given him? I do not know.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I waited until the President's return from his mission to Europe.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell you what you want, every one of you over on the Republican side. You want to find some kind of fault with the President of the United States.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I not suggest to the gentleman that the President is making it very easy for us to do so?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, no; he is not. You are entirely mistaken. The President of the United States has more power than any man on the face of the green earth.

Mr. KNUTSON. Too much—too much!

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Perhaps he has too much; but he has it. That is the main fact. While you Republicans have a majority of 43 in the House and a majority of 2 in the Senate, still you lack a good deal of having the coign of vantage in the political fight that you are precipitating in this House from day to day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have not always agreed with President Wilson, and I never do agree with everything that any man who ever lived does, and never will. Men with brains in their heads and courage in their hearts do not have to agree with any particular man about everything that he does and everything that he asks. [Applause.] When I have differed with him I have come out into the open and fought like a man, taking all the slander, lies, and filth which editors, hoping for some reward, could heap on me. I have not sidled in and sidled out as the gentleman from Wyoming and his followers are doing to-day. When I think he is right I propose to support him, tooth and nail. I shall give him the benefit of the doubt every time as to whether he is right or wrong. If he is palpably wrong, I shall fight him or any other man that ever sits in the White House. Certainly the great Republican Party does not propose to reduce itself simply to a concentrated growl. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] That is exactly what you are all doing. The whole speech of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] was nothing but a growl, and he is getting to be the greatest growler on the American continent, bar none. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Anybody can find fault. That is one of the easiest performances known among men. Any plug can go out with an ordinary telescope and find spots on the sun. They are there; they have always been and always will be, but notwithstanding the spots the sun continues to warm and light and fructify the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can talk all you please about spots upon the present President of the United States, but notwithstanding the fact stands forth that by the verdict of the civilized world he is the foremost man in all the world. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. For a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield me an additional five minutes?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman from Missouri five minutes additional.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not hear what the gentleman from Georgia said.

Mr. UPSHAW. It was just a friendly question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is friendly, all right. I did not start out to pass any eulogy on President Wilson. He needs none. Like Daniel Webster said about Massachusetts, "There she stands and you can judge for yourselves," and there is not a man in the House who has any respect for his own reputation, both for intelligence and veracity, not a single one, who will deny that by the universal suffrage of America he stands at the top of the heap. Now, if any of you want to deny it I will stop long enough to hear you deny it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, about this veto. Of course, it is sidetracked by the committee, and we will never get a chance to vote on it now. I have great respect for the Speaker, but I think he ruled wrong; but that does not make any difference here or there. What we want to do, and I believe the Republicans, the bulk of them, want to do toward this particular proposition, is to give all the money that is needed to take care of and educate these wounded soldiers. [Applause.] And as far as I am individually concerned, I thank God the President vetoed that bill. [Loud applause.] I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield some time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when we had up for consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the sundry civil appropriation bill carrying an item of $4,000,000 for the purpose of administering the powers of the Federal Board for Vocational Rehabilitation of wounded soldiers I had a rather earnest colloquy with some of the members of the Committee on Appropriations upon the assertion made by me, and vouchsafed for by other members of the Committee on Education, that the amount carried in the bill, especially as reported back by the conferees after an agreement with the conferees on the part of the Senate, was totally inadequate for the emergent need of that great organization, and I challenged the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], the chairman of the committee, at that time to state categorically whether or not he was in a position to assert that in view of the testimony before his committee up to that date he was willing to give to the House the assurance that the sum of $6,000,000 finally agreed upon, in view of all the appropriations, was ample for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the amendment to section 1 of the original act and also the general administrative purposes of the board as provided for in the original act.

I asserted then that it was impossible for those figures to come up to the necessities of the situation, for the reason that a few days prior to that occasion this House by unanimous vote had passed a law amending section 2 of the original act by the terms of which law the Federal Board for Vocational Rehabilitation took over under their exclusive jurisdiction from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance at that time approximately 4,000 additional soldiers, making a sum total in anticipation of their immediately giving at that time something over 7,000 men. It was then, as it is now, gentlemen of the committee, a mere matter of mathematics, based upon the pay of $80 a month for single men and $100 for married men, to establish that the appropriation of $6,000,000 carried by that act amending section 2 was only sufficient for the purposes of that amendment, and it did not make any provision whatever for all the other general expenses of the board at that time.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. My time is limited; ask a brief question.

Mr. DEWALT. Are there not practically now 14,000 instead of 7,000? Is not the pay increased from $80 to $85 for single men and to $115 for married men?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was coming to that, and I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. Gentlemen, when we passed this original bill creating this great department of our Government, a new adventure in the history of our Republic, we did not imagine the great scope that it was going to take, we did not imagine the great area, so to speak, of the beneficence of this legislation, and we did not reasonably anticipate the great number of wounded and disabled men who would come under its provisions. At that time it was estimated that the maximum number of all of our wounded and disabled who would come under the provisions of the bill for all time would be 10,000 men, and up to this date, gentlemen of the committee, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], and, as carried out by the testimony before the committee, they already at this date have under their control, or will have very soon, for vocational rehabilitation practically 14,000 wounded and disabled soldiers, and at the rate of $100 a month, an average for 14,000 men, it is simply another matter of mathematics for you to see that this appropriation of $12,000,000 we are providing for here by this amendment is not going to be sufficient to carry out the purposes of this great law, and that hereafter this board will have to come back to Congress for additional appropriations. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the leader of the Republican Party upon this floor, made a vigorous criticism of the President of the United States for sending in this veto; but, gentlemen, I submit for your consideration that the contention of those of us here upon this floor when this matter was up that this money is needed—as a justification and vindication of the righteousness and justice and humanity of the President of the United States action in vetoing this appropriation—is the fact that the Committee on Appropriations has brought in a bill sustaining his position as to the amount required, and very largely liberalizing the restrictions upon the amount of salaries to be paid.

But, gentlemen, in its real essence and analysis this is not a partisan question, and I think it is rather to be regretted that any element of partisanship should come into discussion of this great proposition. These wounded and disabled soldiers are the wards of this great Nation until they have received fully and completely the benefits of this legislation, and every Member of this House is, in his duty here, a trustee of their interest, and upon a fair and legitimate presentation of the fact showing their necessities, called upon to vote every dollar, not in a stingy, miserly way, but, upon the contrary, in a generous and, I am almost tempted to say, an extravagant manner if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like two more minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield two more minutes to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Gentlemen, I think it unfortunate that the restriction upon the salaries should have been fixed. I believe sincerely in the integrity, and not only the integrity but in the wisdom and ability and honesty of those men who are administering this great law. I have no personal interest in any of them. None of them, I believe, comes from my section of the country at all. But they have been men called into the service in this emergency in this great cause, many of them against their real will. Take the case of Dr. Prosser, the director, and he is still, as a matter of fact, superintendent of that great Dunwiddie Institute, out in Minnesota, and it is only by the courtesy of the board of trustees of that institution that his services are temporarily assigned to the Government of the United States. They talk about his salary. He was getting, as president of that institution, the sum of $10,000 per annum, his salary from the Government. If you will make an investigation, you will find that there are a number of these other men who are selected for their capacity, for their excellence of knowledge upon these questions that necessarily go into consideration in making them capable of administering this law, and that they are men who in private avocations and pursuits earn equally as large amounts of salary as those they are now paid.

Under the limitation of time I can not discuss the provisions of this amendment minutely. I rejoice in the interest, at least in the temporary interest, in the wounded and disabled and handicapped and stricken young men of this Republic, who have become so in the service of the flag. Because we stood up here and pleaded in their behalf the other day, we rejoice in the President's veto, which, as indicated by the report brought in by the committee, has resulted in doubling the amount, and we trust will suffice for a large part of the fiscal year to carry out the necessity of caring for those soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennesse. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN].

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, first I want to pay my respects and compliments to the Committee on Appropriations. I believe it realized that it made an error and that it has tried to correct it. I do not think that a discussion whether the request for the appropriation was made in a certain form, or how it was made, enters here. I do not think that any action that has been taken up to this time has any particular weight; that is, such action as is against the bill.

It seems to me it reduces itself to this simple proposition: This great Government of ours, by this Congress in its enactment, has decided that it is going to rehabilitate the soldiers. It is a problem, a definite problem, and with it there are certain avenues and elements. What are they? You are either going to carry out and solve that problem for the benefit of these men and, secondarily, for the benefit of our country, or you are going to put a quietus on it. My opinion is that you are going to solve it.

Now, what is the problem? To-day there are 5,200 crippled men in training. What does that mean? It means that those 5,200 men will be employed, or engaged in receiving that training, for an average of 10 months. Does it cost anything for the training? Yes. How much? The tuition is $17 a month, and by reason of an amendment of the second section of the war-risk insurance act there was transferred an appropriation and a duty and a function which belonged to the War Risk Insurance Board, to the Vocational Board, and made a law here, which said that during the training period of these crippled men they must be supported.

The bill brought in here asked for $75, but this House in its discretion and judgment, which I think wise, enacted a law, which has been signed by the President and is now on the statute books, which gives to the single man $80 and gives to the married man $100 a month, plus his tuition of $17 a month, and, for 10 months' training at $117 a month, for a year it totals $1,400. Plus that $117 a month to the married man there is allowed by allotment $15. If he perchance has one child, he is allowed $10 additional. If he has two children, the second child is allowed $7.50; if he has three children, $5 for the third child, and $5 for every succeeding child. The single man is allowed $80 without dependents, but if he has dependents—and while it may seem a misnomer for a single man to have dependents, it is a fact that he has them—he is allowed for his parents $10 each, and then a gradation down, for his brother, $5, and it goes on down until it reaches his father-in-law. So you can see that the average, where there is a dependent of any of these men, goes from $80 to $117 a month. Twelve months' training equals $1,400. Now, there are actually being trained 5,200 men. Multiply that number by $1,400, and see what the total is. It will go considerably over $6,000,000. When the appropriation was asked for by this board at the last time the sundry civil bill was being considered, it was approximated on this basis. Then the War Risk Insurance Board gave but $35 for support during training, and they averaged $40. There were 7,000 men then ascertained to need training. There were 3,000 actually in training. Four thousand of those men were waiting transfer from the War Risk Insurance Board to the Vocational Board, and your act in amending section 2 accomplished that. That was $90—$60 for support and $30 was estimated during the training for tuition. Seven thousand multiplied by $90 gives you what? It gives you $6,300,000. The board came in and asked for $6,000,000. At that time, my friends, there were but 3,000 actually in training, and this was estimated. What has transpired since? There are now awaiting survey and waiting for training 8,500 men. These men are to average $100. Multiply that by the number——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. No; I have but little time. The gentleman is well prepared to take care of his part. We are friendly. I will state only facts.

Now, what has this country done? What is Canada doing? Canada has a problem, my friends, of 40 per cent less men in training than we have. We have nearly 14,000 men ready now.

There have been surveyed 98,000 men by this board. Canada, with her seven thousand and odd men in training, has appropriated $32,000,000, and we have now ready for training approximately 14,000, and we are expected to do the physically impossible thing with but $12,000,000 appropriated.

These funds, my friends, go only to the training and to the support of these crippled men during training. What are the expenses all of which are vital and necessary? There is the traveling expenses of disabled soldiers, emergency medical care, mechanical appliances, salaries and traveling expenses of employees, rent of district offices, equipment, printing, supplies, expert medical service, and communication. In fact, this $12,000,000 will not provide for these and many other things the board is required to do in the registering, surveying, medical examination, training, and placement of disabled men.

Now, much has been said here about the staff of this organization. I want to be perfectly frank and honest. Each side of the House indulges in it—I do not know what you would call it; it may be politics or it may not be—but whatever it is it is mixed with insincerity, and it has no candor to it, and it does not stand the light of day if there is anything in the administration of this department which needs investigation——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DONOVAN. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. DONOVAN. It is the fashion now to investigate everything, and if there is anything to which exception can be taken in the administration of this department, let us investigate and let us not whitewash it or do an injustice. If we find anything wrong, do not stop with an elaborate report which leads nowhere, such as we heard here in regard to the National Security League, but let us seek an indictment. Let us see who these "terrible men" are, as has been suggested by innuendo. Are they broken-down political hacks or not? What are the requirements for the work? Can you take a chauffeur out of a car and have him administer this department? Can you take a man out of a ditch and put him at it? My opinion, gained by observation and investigation, is that you must have trained executives.

I never heard of Dr. Prosser and never saw him until he came before our committee. He impressed me as a capable man. He is an educated man, president of a Minnesota college, an expert in this line, and a pioneer in the upbuilding of the disabled man; he is efficient, practical, earnest, and sincere. Sometimes these qualities are not all welded in a man of superlative education. Then there was Dr. Chandler. Who is he? He has been selected as the president of William and Mary College, and he was Dr. Prosser's assistant, giving his services at a nominal compensation for this most noble work. Who is Dr. Munroe? He is a prominent and successful Massachusetts business man. Who is Mr. McIntosh? He is a member of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, appointed with the then Cabinet members, with two other distinguished Americans, by the President of the United States.

Gentlemen, let us be honest with them. Do you mean to tell me these men are not men of the highest caliber? If they have surrounded themselves with a staff or a kitchen cabinet, unworthy of the exalted position which they occupy in the administration of their sacred trust, let us see at once the wrong is righted. But if they are such men as I describe, let those in this House that are unjust and unfair forever hereafter desist. We have a problem here, an earnest one, and I often think that the facts have not been sufficiently explained. I know that a Member of another body in this building made a reference in error that the Vocational Board had another appropriation of $5,500,000 for the training of soldiers. It is a fact that there is such an item in the Army appropriation bill. It is for the training of soldiers, oh, yes; but not for these soldiers. It is not for the rehabilitation of disabled and crippled soldiers. It is for the normal soldier man. Our great Government made that an attraction to bring them into the Army, and then to make them mechanics and electricians and efficient in numerous branches of the arts and sciences.

In conclusion I want to say to you, gentlemen, that before the committee of which I am a member, the Committee on Education, there is pending a bill authorizing the appropriation of $100,000,000 for the eradication of illiteracy, for the development of Americanization, for the developing of equal opportunities in this great country, and yet when this $12,000,000 is asked for we hesitate and halt. I would vote $150,000,000 for a proposition to give education and the retraining of men who are not educated and who answered the call of their country and went to battle and returned maimed and crippled, to take them off the human scrap heap, where they would otherwise be thrown as human derelicts or outcasts, and give them an opportunity of hope and spirit, again make them a worthy part of the Commonwealth, make them of advantage and value to their country and to themselves.

Nineteen million dollars is the lowest amount that this rehabilitation problem can be operated on for the present year, and the balance between $12,000,000 and that sum will soon be demanded of your committee. I know that it and no other succeeding body of men is knowingly going to cripple this work when the appropriation for it is asked, or where it is asked, or what clothes a man wore when he asked it. It is a problem in this country, and every man here is for it, and will vote for the appropriation, and I say, "Go to it, and God bless you all for doing it." [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman [Mr. DONOVAN] who has just left the floor. We are all agreed, I am sure, on the general proposition under consideration. There is not a man here but wants to do everything that is necessary for the rehabilitation of these valiant men.

We should remember, however, as was suggested by the majority leader a while ago, that Congress is in session and will be in session, and that this is a matter where a deficit can be allowed, and where a deficiency bill can be brought in later. Any effort that may be made here to fasten upon anybody, either Democrat or Republican, a desire to appropriate too little for this great and worthy purpose I am sure is altogether unwarranted. I know that every man here feels, in the language of the great Master of men, that not one of us is worthy to stoop down and loose the shoe latchets of one of these men who placed his life upon the altar of his country.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have a keen appreciation of the intelligence of the American soldier, and therefore I fear not from his judgment and understanding of this question any effort that may be made here to attempt to discredit anyone on this side of the House, because it seems that possibly not enough was appropriated for this great and worthy purpose.

The intelligent, efficient American soldier can detect a camouflaged political veto just as readily as any Member of this House.

They know that an additional appropriation could have been made within a week at any time, and would have been made, for this purpose. I do not think that the soldiers of this country, from the days of the Civil War down to the present, have any question in their minds as to who have been their friends, and who will provide amply for them at any time necessity requires. They will not discredit men in this House for seeking to keep down unnecessary appropriations on all lines when there is a deficit of from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000 a day in the public Treasury, and when men in every line of industry are clamoring for a reduction of taxes. We are glad and anxious to do everything that is necessary, and we shall do everything that is required. I believe with those who have already expressed the same conviction on this floor that the exercise of the veto power at this time, holding up all these great appropriations and handicapping so many branches of the Government, was unwarranted, and that it would have been far wiser to approve this measure and trust to Congress to meet the deficit when it should occur.

Each Member here knows that this Congress will provide from time to time every dollar that is necessary for the full and effectual rehabilitation of every American soldier.

Mr. GOOD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, Dr. FESS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, there is one item in the amendment reported that I would like to have modified if it does what I am sure it does, and which I do not believe the committee intended it to do. It is that paragraph which says that no person except the members of the Federal Board for Vocational Education shall be paid by said board out of the appropriation contained in this or any other act.

The words "or any other act" would cover the Smith-Hughes Vocational Act, and would exclude the present director of the Vocational Board of Education, who is not a member of the board.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that on Sunday the committee held a hearing, and it was stated in that hearing that the present director intended to resign his position, and that $6,000 was all they were going to require for any salary, that that would be the limit, and that is one reason why the matter was carried as it is.

Mr. FESS. I regret to have that information, that Dr. Prosser is going to resign from this board. My acquaintance with him is of many years standing, and I know he came here at a great loss in salary. Until recently he received $10,000 a year, and a change was made to cut it to $7,500. Now, this cut to $6,000 would, of course, lose him to us if he had not decided voluntarily to retire. I do not care to take any time to eulogize an individual. It is not a matter of legislation, and therefore I do nothing more than simply to express regret at the information I have just received, which is very sudden and supprising to me. I did not know that we were about to lose him.

The Vocational Board is embarrassed over the rapidly increasing demands for its work, that were not known when it began to work. For example, I have a letter which indicates that $6,000,000 would be all that would be required for this work. That was written at a time when the soldiers had not yet returned from Europe in great numbers, and the amount of work was not well understood; but there are 5,200 soldiers now in training, and 8,500 more whose claims have been approved. That would make nearly 14,000 soldiers who are ready to take the training, and at a very conservative estimate it will go away beyond the amount that is here allowed. I am perfectly frank to state that the amount is beyond anything that I had in mind when I introduced the other bill.

Some are inclined to criticize, on the basis that the work is growing too rapidly. If there was no limit to this I would be in the same attitude of suspicion, but the growth is limited by the number of disabled soldiers, and I do not want to be a party to any legislation on the basis of economy that would deny training to any disabled soldier, no matter how many there are or how large the amount is. [Applause.] For that reason I desist from any criticism of the board for asking for the additional amount, and at the same time I share the desire of the Committee on Appropriations to hold it within reasonable bounds. But it is our business here, with the facts in mind, to act according to the latest intelligence that we have.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. DENISON. I agree with what the gentleman has stated, and I was wondering if the gentleman from Ohio had found anyone in this House who really differed with him on that proposition, and who was not willing to appropriate liberally or who wanted to economize especially for this line of activity.

Mr. FESS. I agree with my friend from Illinois that there is no disposition on the part of anyone to cut off the needed training. There has been some misunderstanding as to the facts. When we were considering the bill before, I confess that my mind was not entirely clear as to the magnitude of the demands of this work, and when the chairman of the Appropriations Committee reported that the sundry civil bill carried a certain amount, and indicated that it was a duplication, that statement immediately confused the minds of a good many of us. However, it is not a duplication. Our bill which passed the House the other day carried $6,000,000. This is $6,000,000 more, making $12,000,000 in all for the use of this board, and that is not as much as the present demands would seem to indicate. That is, if we have 14,000 maimed soldiers ready for training, and would put them immediately in training, it will take more than the amount that is allowed. But I am perfectly willing to rest in the conviction that the Congress will meet that additional amount under an urgent deficiency bill if it is presented, and the facts are shown that it is needed. For that reason I am inclined to support the report of the chairman of the committee, with the full intention of doing everything in our power to take care immediately of those who are in need of training. With that statement, with a keen intensity of feeling of what we ought to do, I do not hesitate to vote for the bill as it has come before the House at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW].

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I stand for the man on crutches [applause] not because I happen to be on crutches myself, but because there is a pathos of appeal in any man who faces life with a handicap. If a crowd of newsboys on the street come to me to sell papers, the little fellow who is crippled gets the sale of even more than one if I happen to have the change.

I want to emphasize what was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. If it be true that the highest salary to be paid to the man at the head of this vocational training has been reduced to only $6,000, I am heartily in favor of increasing it. I believe that any man who is big enough and great enough to direct a work as great as this ought certainly to receive as much pay as any Member of this Congress. If Dr. Prosser, to whom such high tribute has just been paid by the gentleman from Ohio, was commanding $10,000 a year as an expert before coming to this vocational training leadership, this Government ought not to expect such sacrifice of him. We owe our wounded soldier boys the best that money can buy.

We are inspired to do our best for these soldiers when we think of so many men and women who have fought their way through life with a handicap, and have been a blessing to the world. When we think of how the greatest history of Mexico was written by Prescott, a man who was blind; when we think of Alexander H. Stephens inspiring this House and ruling his State from the throne of his rolling chair; when we think of Joe F. Sullivan, of Arkansas and Michigan, brilliant editor of the Hospital School Journal and author of "The Unheard Cry," who can not walk a step; when we think of Fanny J. Crosby, blind from childhood, writing songs for the comfort of millions of hearts on earth, and which, I think, must be sung among the hosts of the redeemed; when we think of our honored colleague, Mr. SCHALL, of Minnesota, who leans on his staff and with sightless eyes catches visions of beauty and of patriotism that make him an inspiration to us all; and when we think of these brave spirits who were willing to give their all, who come back to us with armless sleeves or staggering on crutches or with sightless eyes, reaching their hands to the Nation for which they were ready to give their lives, I want to go on record, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as standing for everything, and perhaps a little more, that these brave boys need. When one faculty is lost the others are intensified, and it is wonderful and inspiring to contemplate how a man who has been maimed in body can have his remaining faculties developed in power and efficiency, but expert training is necessary to that development, and I stand unequivocally for this appropriation, and for anything else that may be necessary to help these brave heroes under handicap do their efficient best for themselves and for the Nation that loves them so well. [Applause.]

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Nebraska, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. DONOVAN had leave to revise and extend their remarks.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Wyoming saw fit in his remarks to criticize the President for having vetoed the sundry civil bill on account of the fact that it failed to carry what he considered a sufficient appropriation for the rehabilitation of the soldiers. And yet the gentleman from Wyoming, by his support of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations raising that appropriation, indicates his entire concurrence with the President in the fact that the former sundry civil bill failed to carry a sufficient amount for the rehabilitation of the soldiers. As has been suggested, entertaining the views expressed on the floor of the House, the gentleman from Wyoming, instead of asking that this bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, should have immediately asked the House to pass the bill, notwithstanding the veto by the President. His support of an increased appropriation is in itself an indorsement of the veto of the President and entirely inconsistent with his recent remarks.

As a matter of fact, all of the public activities to which the gentleman from Wyoming refers are being carried on at the present time. We know that there will absolutely be no hindrance or let-up in this work. It is true there is at the present time no appropriation for the maintenance, but everyone understands that this bill will become a law in a few days, and that there will be absolutely no embarrassment in any of these activities.

The statement has been made to the effect that under a Democratic House in February last only $2,000,000 was appropriated for this identical purpose. The bill which passed the House in February carried an appropriation of $2,000,000 and made available the $2,000,000 that had theretofore been appropriated. It appeared at that time that the needs of the Vocational Board were only $4,000,000.

I think the report of the committee was $1,500,000 and the committee raised it on the floor of the House to $2,000,000. There was no objection made on the part of anyone that that sum was insufficient, and so far as I know there was no objection on the part of the Vocational Board. The facts are that at that time, as it is now, the Vocational Board was not in a position to say just how much money they needed. A Member has only to read the hearings held by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations last Sunday to ascertain that fact. As a matter of fact, when the Committee on Appropriations reported the bill at this session of Congress it reported an appropriation of $4,000,000 for the Vocational Board, and that was all that they were asking under authority of law. It is true that they had sent a letter to the chairman of the committee, in which they indicated they might need $8,500,000. But so far as I have been able to ascertain the Vocational Board, up to the 1st of June, believed that they would not need more than $8,500,000.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Could not they have come in at any time before a succeeding Congress and get all they needed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But does the gentleman approve of that method of legislation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not. I do not approve of deficiency legislation except when absolutely necessary.

I think that Congress, when it can determine the facts, should appropriate every dollar that is necessary for the ensuing fiscal year, but here is a case where even the members in charge of the work, where even the members of the Vocational Board, are unable to give to Congress just how much they will need.

Mr. DENISON. Is it not a fact that in an emergency like war, or the conditions growing out of war, there are a great many activities as to which, as a matter of absolute necessity, under the circumstances there can be no accurate estimate made? For instance, like the Army or the Navy, or for this kind of a service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DENISON. And under those conditions the practical way to meet them is by a deficiency.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct. My remarks as to want of information on the part of the Vocational Board are not intended as a criticism, because we all know that it is impossible for them now to say just how many disabled soldiers and sailors will apply for this training and will be entitled to it. Those are facts which must be developed as we go along. The point I was trying to make is this, that when this present sundry civil appropriation bill was reported to the House, the only estimate before the Committee on Appropriations was one for $4,000,000, and when I refer to an estimate I refer to an estimate coming in the legal way, through the Secretary of the Treasury. As I said a moment ago, there was a letter addressed to the chairman of the committee which indicated they would need about two million and a half in addition to the sum carried in the bill, amending section 2 of the original act, which would make eight million and a half; and if that had been true then there could have been no injury done to this service by the passage of the sundry civil appropriation bill, which carried $6,000,000. But a different state of facts was evidently presented to the President and also presented to the Committee on Appropriations last Sunday, showing that they will need a great deal more than $6,000,000. The fact of the matter is, from the statements made as to the number of men who are now in training, who have been accepted for training and who are expected to apply, I do not think the sum of $12,000,000 will be anything like sufficient to carry on the work throughout the next fiscal year. I feel satisfied, however, that the sum of $12,000,000 which is carried under this bill will be sufficient to carry them at least for six or eight months of the year, so that Congress will have ample opportunity at the next session to appropriate whatever is necessary. I do not believe there is a man on the floor of the House who would deny the disabled soldiers and sailors a single dollar that is necessary to provide them with the proper training under the law.

There may be some difference as to the limitation upon the question of salaries. There may be some who think there ought not to be any limitation and others who think that the salary limitation here is too liberal. This limitation authorizes the Vocational Board to spend, I think, something in the neighborhood of $850,000 for salaries to persons who draw more than $2,500 a year, and the lid is off, the sky is the roof, so far as the amount they may expend in salaries under $2,500 is concerned.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Is it not $941,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That was the amount estimated by the Federal Vocational Board, but I think the committee's limitation has reduced it by about $94,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I find the following in the language of the proviso:

> That no persons (except members of the Federal Board for Vocational Education) shall be paid by said board out of the appropriation contained in this or any other act at a rate of compensation exceeding $2,500 per annum.

Was it the purpose of the committee in framing that proviso to restrict this limitation to the officials employed by the Federal Board for the Rehabilitation of Wounded Soldiers, or was it in the purview of the committee that this limitation should apply to salaries paid to the old existing Board of Vocational Training?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; the members of the board are especially excepted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I mean the employees of that other board.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was the purpose of the committee to limit any salary that may be paid in this service by the Federal Board to the sums set out in the amendment. The gentleman will recall that there are three or four employees, possibly, of the board now who are drawing salaries from two different sources. In my own judgment it is contrary to a provision of law carried in one of the naval appropriation bills, but I am informed that the Comptroller of the Treasury has passed on it and says that it is proper. Of course, to his decision we must bow, but the committee in recommending that provision to the House did so with the purpose of preventing any salaries being paid out of any other fund in order to supplement salaries set forth in this amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the specific proposition I want to clarify is whether this is intended under the salary limitation to embrace the employees of the original Vocational Board?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It applies to all of the employees.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And is not limited to those employed by the board under the act for the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then it is new legislation restricting the salary basis of some men already on the roll of the Vocational Board?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that a former hearing developed that $10,000 was being paid to one employee, $5,000 from one fund and $5,000 from another. The sundry civil bill which we passed fixed the maximum at $7,500. The maximum salary under this amendment is $6,000. That is in accordance with an understanding with the members of the Federal Vocational Board and was their own suggestion. They stated to the committee that they did not desire to pay anyone more than $6,000 and not more than two persons at the rate of $5,000.

Mr. MADDEN. The restriction intended by the limitation is to prevent some man who on the face of things is supposed to get $5,000 from getting $10,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. That is as it ought to be. A man ought not be permitted to be on more than one pay roll, and that is what this restriction means.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I have just made an examination as to how far this limitation will reach. There are 22 men now in the service under the Smith-Hughes Act who will be cut out if this remains in the bill. There are 15 regional directors under that bill who get $3,500 each. There are 2 assistants here in Washington who get $4,000. These numbers that are specified here are limited to the rehabilitation of soldiers' activities. If this and any other act remain, it is going to disorganize the work under the Smith-Hughes vocational bill, and I think there was no effort to do that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is no effort to disorganize any service, I will say to the gentleman; but if the gentleman will read this amendment he will find a most liberal provision as to salaries, more liberal, I venture to say, than any other act that has ever been passed through the Congress, and liberal because of the tremendous organization that has been built up by the Federal Board for Vocational Education. As a matter of fact, the facts show that they now have an organization amounting to $3,488,000 per annum, and your committee felt and believe Congress will feel that it ought to keep its hand upon some of these salaries and put in a limitation which seems ample enough under all the circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. I do not believe my friend would say $3,500 for a regional director was too much. There are 15 of them throughout the whole United States, and the gentleman would not say that that was an exorbitant price to pay them, and this bill will cut them out——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; this bill does not, I submit to the gentleman, cut them out.

Mr. FESS. Yes, it does; this bill does cut them out.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill provides for 28 in excess of $3,500 and not in excess of $4,000 each——

Mr. FESS. They are all employed under the soldiers' rehabilitation act.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But under this bill there are 28 in excess of $3,500, 27 at $3,500, which makes more than 50.

Mr. FESS. But it does not include the regional directors under the Smith-Hughes Act. That includes those employed under the soldiers' disability act. You are going to cut out those under the Smith-Hughes Act, and I do not think the committee wants to do that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say frankly to the gentleman that my own idea of this provision was to limit the amount of salaries, the number paid, and the amount that might be paid out of the funds provided in this bill and the act which passed the other day under the charge of the gentleman from Ohio, and not to affect any other service.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the gentleman on that; but you are going back to the Smith-Hughes Act of 1918, which will cripple the service, and I do not think the committee wants to do that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee certainly has no idea of crippling the service. I say to the gentleman this provides for salaries of persons receiving over $2,500, about $850,000 in round numbers, and then, as I said awhile ago, they have absolutely unlimited authority to employ just as many as they please under $2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Iowa begins speaking, I have something on my mind and I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. GOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to say that the salary roll that this board has accumulated amounts to about $3,400,000 a year. Now, I would like to know how much money they spend——

Mr. GOOD. I will take that up. I will try to answer the gentleman before I have completed my statement, but I want to make a statement in a logical way.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will yield, I want to know the percentage of cost of management. If you are going to expend 25 per cent of all the money for salaries, there ought to be some restriction somewhere, I do not care whether it is for the soldiers or for anyone else. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not a fact that when the other bill was up from the Committee on Education that three motions were made on this side of the House to increase the monthly amount, two of which were unsuccessful and the third was successful, and that all three of those motions to increase the monthly allowance came from this side of the House? Is not that a fact?

Mr. GOOD. I have not given attention to that phase of the matter and do not recall, but if the gentleman was here and remembers what was done, I will take his statement for it. I want to say now at the outset I do not believe——

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will pardon me in this connection——

Mr. GOOD. I do not yield further just now.

Mr. FOSTER. It was by a vote of 62 to 57.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the public will or should look with approval upon any attempt from any source, I do not care how high that source may be, to drag in the mire of party politics the rehabilitation of our soldiers. The rights of the injured soldier are too sacred and our obligation therein is too great to think this should be done. [Applause on the Republican side.] I say without fear of successful contradiction that if the sundry civil bill as passed by the House in the last Congress had become law, only $2,000,000 would have been available to rehabilitate the soldiers who were so unfortunate as to be wounded in this Great War. This Congress has already appropriated $6,000,000 for the service and we are appropriating $6,000,000 by this bill, or $12,000,000, as opposed to $2,000,000 in the last Congress. Now, let us get down to the solid facts and see just what we are talking about with regard to the veto of this measure. Under the law there never was sent to Congress but one estimate for this service for this fiscal year, and that was $4,000,000. Subsequently, from the Committee on Education, there came a bill amending section 2 of the act carrying $6,000,000 of appropriations, and that bill passed and has become the law, and every dollar of it is available for rehabilitation services.

The director, Dr. Prosser, on the 6th day of June, 1919, addressed a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in which he said that if the bill, coming with a favorable report from the Committee on Education, carrying $6,000,000, should be adopted, then the estimate which he had made in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, increasing the regular estimate of $4,000,000 to $6,000,000, could be reduced by $3,500,000, which would leave available $8,500,000 for the service. And until the President vetoed this bill there was never an intimation from anyone that the service would cost more than $8,500,000 for the next year.

The gentleman, Dr. Prosser, who has been referred to as a very able man by Dr. FESS, made the statement when this measure was before the committee before that the total cost for the entire service for rehabilitating every man in the United States was $13,502,200, and that it would require for the fiscal year $6,000,000, or until the 30th day of June, 1920. You will find his table on page 19 of the report in the last hearings. It is as follows:

Total cost of work to be done (estimated).

19,000 men trained for 10 months each, at average cost of $655	$12,455,000
27,360 men to be placed in employment, at $20 each	547,200
60,000 additional men yet to be surveyed, at cost of $10 per man	600,000
Total cost of work from June 27, 1918	13,602,200

The Federal Board of Vocational Education is composed of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, the Commissioner of Education, Mr. Holden, Mr. McIntosh, and Mr. Munroe. I have no prejudice, and I am sure the other members of the subcommittee that heard the testimony both in this Congress and in the last Congress have no prejudice against any of these men or against the director, Dr. Prosser. The men were unknown to us. I never knew any of them, except the members of the Cabinet, and they have not appeared before the committee. But I say to you without regard to politics there was no division in the Committee on Appropriations, either in the last Congress or in this, with regard to the fact that there never was a body of men anywhere intrusted with a great work who seemed to know as little about the subject, who had as small a vision of the great work with which they were intrusted or were attempting to perform as this board to whom we have intrusted the rehabilitation of these boys who have been so unfortunate as to be wounded in this Great War. These boys that were wounded are entitled to rehabilitation under this act and have the tenderest sympathy of every Member of the House. [Applause.] And they should have the tenderest and deepest sympathy of every loyal and true American. And I believe they have. I have stated several times on the floor of the House that Congress would not and the country would not tolerate any cheeseparing with regard to this service. And if the President had signed this bill, and if the limitations were too rigid, if the money carried was found too little, he could have come before the committee or had some one else come before the committee, and within 48 hours he would have received a favorable report, lifting the limitation to the extent that the service would not be impaired. That has been the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations, every member of it, without regard to the political parties to which those members belong, so far as I know.

The President says in his message on this subject:

> Inasmuch as there are already over 4,000 disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines in training, and inasmuch as another 4,000 will be put in training now that the amendment to section 2 has become a law, it is clear that even at the rate of only $80 a month, a sum approximating $8,000,000 will be required for the support of these men.

Who told the President that? Mr. Munroe says it is not true. Mr. Munroe says he did not tell it, and he does not know who did tell the President. Eight thousand men? Four thousand in training, and 4,000 ready for training. Mr. Munroe testified within three days of the date the President wrote that message that instead of 4,000 in training there were 5,200. Instead of 4,000 more waiting there were 8,250 waiting. The President says 8,000. The vice president of this organization says there are almost 14,000. The President says it will take $8,000,000 to pay for the subsistence and tuition of these men. The vice president of the board, within two days after the President's message, says that it would take $18,000,000 to pay this cost. And yet the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] rises here and says that he supports this message. I do not know where the President got the information, but Mr. Munroe denies its correctness.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. For a question.

Mr. BRYNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will recall, from the veto message of the President, that the $8,000,000 will be used totally for subsistence?

Mr. GOOD. Of course, the gentleman is correct about that. That is what I have read.

Now, immediately after the passage of this law this man who has been so loudly praised by my very good friend, Dr. FESS, sent this message throughout the United States, for which I contend there is absolutely no warrant, and that it is at variance with the facts. His message was:

Under legislation just passed there must be drastic reduction of salaries unless, as we hope, some way can be found to prevent it. Therefore, withdraw immediately all forces from hospitals and other points of discharge and discontinue this service at once. Readjust your forces by releasing a number of men equal to the number so withdrawn. Retain the best qualified men. Inform all men remaining in the service who are receiving over $2,500 that such excess can not be guaranteed after July 1. Urge all good men to stick by the disabled soldier to see if the matter can not be straightened out.

Notwithstanding that message, the bill that he referred to carried 52 places with salaries over $2,500. Is it possible that a man violating the statutes of the United States that provide that no man shall receive two salaries, and this man so receiving two salaries, and is sending out such a false telegram, is the kind of a man to bring rehabilitation to those boys who were wounded in carrying the flag to glory? It ought not to be possible. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Munroe says that the cost per man was $275. And my good friend——

Mr. MADDEN. Two hundred and seventy-five dollars for how long?

Mr. GOOD. For the complete training. Dr. FESS referred to that fact in his speech, I think, of February 24, in which he said:

The truth about the matter—

I am quoting now from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]—

The truth about the matter is, and I want to call attention to it just a minute, that it costs $275, according to the estimate, to rehabilitate a soldier. Think of it! Two hundred and seventy-five dollars in taking a wounded man and putting him on his feet and making him self-supporting and self-respecting, so that he does not become a charge on the Government, but can look the world in the face and not feel that he is a pensioner, a subject of charity; and yet we educate in universities and under private management students at a cost of $1,000 to $2,000.

Now, Dr. FESS is one of the very ablest men on the floor of this House. It takes an expert of the kind referred to, I take it, in the President's message, to fool Dr. FESS. But Mr. Munroe and Dr. Prosser completely fooled him. What are the facts? According to the testimony of these men last Sunday, it will take, not $275, but for subsistence and tuition alone $1,400 for each man.

Mr. MADDEN. Does that $1,400 include the salary of the men that spend this money each year?

Mr. GOOD. It does not. That is for maintenance and tuition. I have a letter here as to the men who are now employed and placed on the pay roll at salaries of $2,500 and over per annum, showing that they will draw out of the Federal Treasury this next year on the present basis of employment $941,000.

Ah, but that is not all. Gentlemen talk about the rehabilitation. This message pleads more for the rehabilitation of the college professor than it does for the soldiers of the United States. [Applause.] Why, this letter just written this morning by the board says:

In response to your telephonic request, I take pleasure in advising you that the pay rolls for personal services of persons employed in the administration of vocational rehabilitation act during the month of June, 1919, amounted to $291,719.80. This amount multiplied by 12 equals $3,488,537.60.

Remember that this is not to pay for teachers or the salary of the men who will train these men. This is the salary of the chair warmers—the men for whose rehabilitation the message pleads. And yet, according to the testimony of Dr. Prosser, this great expert, it was only going to require about $13,000,000 for three years to pay all of the expenses of the rehabilitation of every soldier who will come under the provisions of that very splendid law.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. The $13,000,000 was arrived at under the estimates of the old law, which permitted $30 per month for subsistence, while the new law gives them $80 a month, which is more than double.

Mr. GOOD. Well, the gentlemen has not stated that exactly correct. The change was made from $75 to $80 a month, or an increase of $5 per month, but there was, of course, an amount equal to $35 a month transferred from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and now part paid by the board.

Mr. FESS. Originally it was $30 a month that the disabled soldier got as subsistence, but now we make it $80, and that makes the difference.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. I will as soon as I shall have concluded. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] will make a computation, he will find that the changes will not foot anything like $1,400. I want to give the House these facts, and then I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. But these facts that I have are facts that the House ought to have.

Mr. GOOD. I will try to give the House the facts which I think it ought to have first. Then I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the House has no rights here.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; it has. But no one has the right to take a man off the floor. I do not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa refuses to yield.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Munroe, in making his statement to the committee, said that the Federal Board for Vocational Education never knew that there was a limitation as to salaries in this provision that was carried in the last bill. The bill that passed the House in February, carrying $2,000,000, placed a limitation on the salaries that these people could receive, and that limitation was greater, and everybody in the House, irrespective of whether he was a Republican or a Democrat, voted for it. That limitation was greater than the limitation in the bill which the President vetoed, and yet Mr. Munroe and Mr. McIntosh came before the committee on Sunday last and said they never knew that limitation was in the bill.

Now, let us see whether they knew or not. On the 6th day of June Mr. Prosser addressed a letter to me as chairman of the committee, and in that letter he says:

The House Committee on Appropriations reported to the committee the whole lump appropriation of $1,500,000 on motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the appropriation, and this amount was raised in the Committee of the Whole to $2,000,000, and included in an item in the sundry civil bill as it passed the House.

Why, Dr. Prosser knew who made the motion increasing the amount from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000, and yet they came before us on Sunday last and said they did not know what was in the bill that they referred to in this letter, giving the amount that the bill carried and the name of the gentleman who made the motion. Mr. Munroe, who is vice chairman in charge of this matter, never made an estimate to Congress under the Secretary of the Treasury but for $4,000,000 for this service for the next year. He wrote that letter saying that if the $6,000,000 was granted in the educational bill all the additional amount that would be required was $2,500,000, or $8,500,000 in all. Then he withheld from Congress and the Committee on Appropriations all the information he had in regard to this service until last Sunday, when he came before the committee, and for the first time that human lips uttered the words, so far as I am advised, Mr. Munroe said it is going to take $18,000,000 just to pay for the training and the tuition, and he thinks the total sum may amount to $25,000,000. And no estimate even now for any additional amount.

Gentlemen, the estimate was made last October of $4,000,000, when this country was at war, and every day the wires were flashing the news to various parts of the country, to the cities and to the hamlets and the towns, telling of some brave boy who was falling in battle; and it was at that time, when the list of wounded was growing day by day, that this great committee of experts said it would only cost $4,000,000 for this year. And now, six months after the armistice was signed, they come in and think it may take $25,000,000 for this service. But they do not know; that nobody knows. Now, it was on this showing that the committee reported out a bill carrying $6,000,000 additional to the $6,000,000 already appropriated, or $12,000,000, which is ten millions more than was carried in the bill as it passed the House in the last Congress. It may not be enough, but if it is not, all that will be necessary will be for the board to submit a new estimate and the money will the appropriated. There is absolutely no question about that. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the first reading of the bill was dispensed with under the rule. Was it not?

The CHAIRMAN. This is not the first reading of the bill. This is the reading of the bill for amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand there is no amendment but the new matter. I ask unanimous consent that the second reading of the bill be dispensed with, except as to the new matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would entertain the proposition, but, unfortunately, the House has already ruled that the bill shall be read. This committee can not change that rule by unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. When you get through with the paragraph, I would like recognition. Nobody knows when you finish a paragraph, because we have not a copy of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will request the Clerk to indicate when he reaches the end of the paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, we are in committee now, and notwithstanding the rule, it seems to me it would be in order for the committee to rise, if it sees proper so to do, and the House, notwithstanding any rule by unanimous consent, could omit the reading of this bill, which will take two or three or four hours, and which is not subject to amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. If the committee should rise, is it the ruling of the Chair that the House can not grant unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling that the Chair made was that the committee could not change the order of the House.

Mr. GOOD. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7343) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, except the provision on page 19 with respect to vocational rehabilitation, shall be considered as having been read, and that the further reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill, except the provision as to vocational rehabilitation, on page 19, be considered as having been read.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. GOOD. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 7343, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil bill, H. R. 7343, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to be notified when we reach the end of a paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, namely:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition.

Mr. GOOD. I make the point of order that under the rule no motion or amendment is in order except to the provision on page 19 relating to vocational education.

Mr. MADDEN. I insist on a reading of the rule to see whether that is true or not.

Mr. GOOD. I make the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I insist on having the rule read, so that I may see whether the point of order is well taken.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. That has been done under the rule. This is the second reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The first reading of the bill has already been dispensed with.

Mr. GOOD. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask that the rule be read, to see whether the gentleman's point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the rule provides that no amendment is in order except an amendment to the particular section referred to in the rule, on page 19.

Mr. BUTLER. You can not even move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if that rule provides that you can not amend any part of this bill except one part——

Mr. BUTLER. It does that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the rest of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Missouri that the Chair has already ruled that that can not be done in Committee of the Whole, the House having ordered otherwise.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the Chair hear me on that?

Mr. MADDEN. I object, Mr. Chairman, if necessary, so that there need be no discussion about it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I just want to say this——

Mr. WALSH. The point of order has been made—the objection has been made.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It does not make any difference if the objection has been made. I am arguing a point of order to the Chair, and the Chair has recognized me, and there is no force in this House that can take me off the floor under those circumstances.

Mr. WALSH. There is no point of order pending.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The point of order has been raised, and I asked to be heard on it, on the right to make a request for unanimous consent in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman started to argue a point of order that the Chair had already decided, but the Chair has the right to recognize the gentleman, and the Chair has done so.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The Chair has that right absolutely, and nobody can take me off my feet on that except the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the right to recognize the gentleman from Virginia, and has done so, on the point of order. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, what I wish to say in this connection is this: It is perfectly true that in Committee of the Whole we can not do anything by unanimous consent that would affect the procedure in the House, or usurp the power of the House by undertaking to give rights that are in excess of our authority, as for instance to give leave to extend remarks generally in the RECORD. The RECORD is not a committee publication. But with respect to proceedings in the Committee of the Whole, we may facilitate them by omitting by unanimous consent to do something that is not of the essence. Suppose we take such action. Who is there to gainsay us, and since we do not report the steps taken in the Committee of the Whole in detail, what evidence will there be when we return to the House of our unanimous consent proceeding? There is no rule of which I have any cognizance which undertakes to say that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole shall not put a request for unanimous consent, whatever it may be. There is no likelihood that mischief will result from action sought by unanimous consent, for the reason that one objection will reject the request. I have seen many things done in Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent which were contrary to the provisions of some House rule, but the public business was expedited by this action. At times action is taken in Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent, which at other times has been refused. For instance, I have seen the time for general debate which had been fixed in the House, extended by unanimous consent in Committee of the Whole. This request to dispense with this reading relates to us, to our authority, to our action, to our proceedings exclusively. To read this bill is pure formality that will accomplish nothing, save to waste our time. If by unanimous consent we omit that action, the validity of our report to the House and consequent disposition of the same, will be in no wise affected.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend, if the House adopts a rule for certain procedure in the consideration of a measure, that when the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole the committee can abrogate that rule by a request to dispense with the reading if objection is made?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not if objection is made, certainly not. I am not contending for that proposition: but for the right on our part to facilitate our own proceedings in Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent. The time of general debate in the Committee of the Whole is primarily fixed in the House, but suppose after we get into Committee of the Whole, we agree amongst ourselves to debate generally for a longer period, how will that affect the validity of our ultimate action? What is the difference in substance between that action, and in beating the devil about the bush by taking up the bill under the five-minute rule and after reading a paragraph agree by unanimous consent that a Member shall proceed for an hour out of order? As I have stated I have seen general debate excluded by unanimous consent in the Committee of the Whole. Moreover I contend that that action was perfectly proper and parliamentary.

Do the Members of this body realize that most of our proceedings in the Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent are in contravention of some rule of the House, and there is no difference in authority and effect between a special rule for action on a given measure, and the general rules under which we may consider another bill. If by unanimous consent we can waive, or dispense with formal procedure imposed by the general rules upon proceedings in Committee of the Whole, we can dispense by like unanimity with provisions of the same character in a special rule under which we may chance to be operating. This it seems to me, must be a patent and unescapable conclusion.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman realizes that this is a pretty important bill, and I think the gentleman will agree that anything of the kind ought not to be done in the committee, but that we should go into the House to do it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If the thing proposed to be done jeopardized in anywise this bill I would not suggest this action. Further if request was made for any action that would in any conceivable degree imperil the future of this measure, I would be the first to object to it, but I defy anyone to point out how, or in what way, if we dispense with the reading of this measure by unanimous consent, that fact will ever appear in the House when we report this bill with our conclusions. The bill would be taken up in the House for action on the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and disposed of in order. The regularity of that disposition would not be affected by the fact that we had saved several very precious hours for more important work than remaining in session for a reading to which no one would give the slightest attention.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Where the Committee of the Whole is required to perform a certain act, is it not within the power of the committee, by unanimous consent, to dispense with that act?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. There is no question about that.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The Committee of the Whole, under the rule, must have the bill read, but it seems proper, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the reading.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; and it is the same as read when, by unanimous consent, it is agreed to dispense with the reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can within certain limits control its own action, but the committee must act under the direction of the House when the House has directed the committee so to act. It is not within the power of the committee to vary it. The rule adopted provides that at the conclusion of general debate the bill shall be read. That is the rule for the committee to act upon, and there is no possibilfty of the committee changing that rule. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Vocational rehabilitation: For an additional amount for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918; as amended, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, $6,000,000, of which sum not exceeding $15,000 may be expended for rent of quarters in the District of Columbia if space is not provided in Government-owned buildings by the Public Buildings Commission: Provided, That no person (except the members of the Federal Board for Vocational Education) shall be paid by said board out of the appropriation contained in this or any other act at a rate of compensation exceeding $2,500 per annum and rates above that sum, except not to exceed the following: One at $6,000, 2 at $5,000 each, 28 in excess of $3,500 and not in excess of $4,000 each, 27 at $3,500 each, 70 at $3,000 each, 60 at $2,750 each, and 100 at $2,500 each.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the sum of $6,000,000 and inserting $8,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MADDEN: Strike out the sum of $6,000,000 and insert $8,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, according to the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, it seems that it will take anywhere from $18,000,000 to $25,000,000 to do the work of rehabilitating the wounded soldiers. And while he says that no estimate for more than $4,000,000 was ever made in the regular way, in addition to that provided for in the act reported from the Committee on Education, yet he says that beyond any doubt it will take at least $18,000,000. The proposal is to appropriate $6,000,000, and that is in addition to the amount appropriated under the vocational act, which will make a total of $12,000,000.

The President of the United States said in his veto message of this measure that not less than $8,000,000 would be needed to meet the emergency that is now before us. I am for rehabilitating the soldier at whatever cost, and I am not for making the appropriation by piecemeal on the theory that we can meet the emergency in deficiency bills at some future time. I am in favor of appropriating money to meet the need now and not some other time. This is the time, and this is the hour, and there can be no excuse for reporting a bill with the same amount that has been rejected through the veto of the President. If it takes $18,000,000, or mayhap $25,000,000, to meet the needs of these men who come before us and say that $12,000,000 is enough, let us appropriate that sum.

Complaint is made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that those in charge of the rehabilitation of these soldiers have been unable to say how many men would need rehabilitation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not now, thank you. We must all realize that no man living can tell how many men will need it until the war is over. No man living can tell how many of the wounded men would need rehabilitation until they have served a period of treatment in the hospitals in this country and in France. And as time goes by it will undoubtedly be proved beyond any question that more of these men will need that treatment, need the education, need the rehabilitation, for many of them are not going to be cured of what might in the beginning seem to be but a very slight wound.

And so I say that we have an obligation, a greater obligation than was ever imposed upon a legislative body in all the world, and that obligation is to see beyond question that whatever funds may be needed are supplied for the rehabilitation of these men.

They are unable to make a living for themselves; otherwise vocational education would not have been provided, and no man is permitted to enter this vocational educational institution except the men who must be reconstructed. And shall we say that a million or two million dollars is to stand in the way of reconstruction of men who gave their all for the flag, who buckled on their armor and went forth where battles raged to offer for the Nation's life the lifeblood of their hearts? Are we to say that the appropriation bill must carry six and not eight million dollars? Shall we stand upon the order of the amount? We have already expended $51,500,000,000 for the war, and we have left 112,500 American boys buried on the fields of France, and I say the time has come when America, through its Congress, must speak, and now is the time to increase the appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN offers the following substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN:

Amend the bill by striking out the figures "$6,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$12,000,000," and add at the end of the provision after the word "each" the following provision, to wit:

"And provided further, That not more than 18 per cent of all appropriations made by Congress on this subject shall be used for the payment of salaries."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I have been sitting here and listening to Members discuss this subject, and everyone, without exception, has expressed unlimited sympathy with, and a perfect willingness to aid, those who have met with misfortunes in the war. I thought possibly this amendment would give them the opportunity to demonstrate whether or not they meant what they said, and extend to all who were injured in the war an opportunity to reap the benefits of the rehabilitation act and not have it limited to a few. Let me state a few facts from the hearings, and if any man believing these facts can escape from the conclusion that it will take $18,000,000 or more, then I do not know what mathematics mean.

Mr. Munroe says, in round numbers, there are 14,000 men in training in this service now. It takes $80 per month under the compensation law for each unmarried man, $115 for a man with a wife, and $125 for a man with a wife and one child, and so on up, according to the number of children he has, as provided by the compensation act. This makes an average of $1,200 per year for each man in training. It takes $200 a year for tuition for each man, which makes the amount $1,400 a year per man for compensation and tuition alone. Multiply $1,400 a year by 14,000 and you have over $19,000,000. Escape it if you can. If you want to provide for these boys, you ought to appropriate the necessary money to accommodate all who apply. Be men and meet the issue; be not penny wise and pound foolish when making appropriations to be used for the benefit of those who on foreign fields upheld our flag so bravely and so gloriously.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. If I understand the reading of the gentleman's amendment, he provides for $12,000,000?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Twelve million dollars in this bill, and that, in addition to the $6,000,000 appropriated the other day for this purpose in the vocational education act, making a total of $18,000,000.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would permit, I wish he would tell us how he fixed the percentage of salary.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The way I fixed the percentage to be expended in salaries and the reason I did it is to keep the organization, if it be so inclined, from spending in the payment of salaried officers the appropriation we make for the benefit of the soldiers.

Under the bill as reported by the committee the board in control of the rehabilitation activities have unlimited power to employ an unlimited number of civilian employees at salaries between twenty-five and twenty-six hundred dollars each per year. I do not say that this board will abuse this discretion, but believe it the duty of Congress to throw sufficient safeguards around this appropriation to guarantee that the money we appropriate will be applied to the rehabilitation of the soldiers and not squandered in the payment of salaries to numberless civilian employees throughout the country.

Mr. KINCHELOE. But how does the gentleman arrive at the 18 per cent?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I based it on the present salary basis of the board, and found that 18 per cent of the $18,000,000 will give $3,240,000 for salaries, which is, I believe, about the amount they are now paying in salaries, and I feel that more than one-sixth of an appropriation of this size ought to be sufficient for salaries of employees to conduct and supervise the operation of this institution.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does not that include operating expenses, office, and all that—general expenses?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; it includes only salaries.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the gentleman appropriates $18,000,000 altogether and then shows that it is necessary to expend $3,000,000 and odd for salaries, he will be $3,000,000 short.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly, but I figure that in this way: It usually takes about 10 months to train a soldier. That leaves $200 per year to spare for each soldier. In other words, the $1,400 is calculated for the full 12 months. It would take about 10 months on an average to train a soldier, which would leave $200 per soldier to make up for extra expenses.

Mr. ANDERSON. Eighteen million dollars was figured on a 12-months' basis?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; but it does not take 12 months. It takes 10 months, although some may take more. I submit that proposition to the House, and I say that we should meet the issue and that we should not be penny wise and pound foolish. We should not be parsimonious with these soldiers; we should not run any chance of excluding even one single man whom it is necessary to rehabilitate. It is the most sacred and the highest duty of this Government, as far as the resources of the Government will permit, to restore the impaired ability to earn a livelihood to each of our soldier boys who were injured in this war. Those boys who responded to their country's call, offered their lives for their country's sake, fearlessly invaded the gas-poisoned forests, held trenches against overwhelming odds, went over the top, and carried the tide of battle against the Hun at the point of the bayonet, and in so doing received serious wounds and material injury, which impaired their ability to earn a living. It is the duty of this Government to restore that impaired ability as far as it is humanly possible to do so, and any Member of Congress who fails to cheerfully respond to a generous discharge of this duty disgraces his high office and should be scourged from the House with a whip of scorpion tails.

But reverting again to the facts. There are 14,000 men whose applications have been approved for the rehabilitation training, and it will take over $19,000,000 for maintenance and tuition alone to train these men. This makes no provision for medical attention, for car fare, and for administration work. This makes no provision for the thousands of other wounded soldiers who are daily applying for this training or no provision even for the examination and survey of other applicants who have been wounded and are seeking to be benefited by this law. There is an average of 150 wounded soldiers per day applying for this training, and this appropriation makes no provision for them.

If we mean what we profess and perform our duty to these boys who so gallantly and courageously served their country, we must act now and restore their impaired ability as far as it is within our power to do so, that life to them may be less burdensome and more pleasant. This is an undertaking that can not be postponed, and the statement that we can take care of them in a deficiency appropriation bill is misleading and hypocritical, as every Member of this House knows that the appropriation we make now will limit and confine the work and result in the exclusion of many wounded soldiers from the benefits of the rehabilitation act.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's idea is about right, and I am going to vote for his amendment, but does he think there is any danger of the President's vetoing it because we make it too much?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think not. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the President in his veto message said it would take $8,000,000 alone for subsistence of only 8,000. Our figures show there are 14,000, and that they are coming in at the rate of 150 a day. Therefore, if anything, the appropriation is too small even if my amendment is adopted. I do not think the President will veto it, but I do think the President was right in vetoing the bill because this appropriation was too small. Instead of being criticized by Republicans in the House, he should be commended. He of all men realizes the duty of this Government to take care of the wounded boys, and he of all men will see that this Government does its duty toward these boys. If Congress does not make an adequate appropriation to take care of these wounded soldiers, I sincerely hope the President will veto the bill again.

Ah, gentlemen, if you will talk with some of these wounded soldiers who have come back, you will find that they went through hell itself for our country and its cause. If, therefore, they went through hell for us, we ought to be willing to go to hell for them. It is true, by their heroic action and victory they have "inscribed their lofty name a light, a landmark on the cliffs of fame," but they can not live on fame alone. We must therefore make adequate provision for their rehabilitation, as far as possible, and compensate them for their impaired abilities, to the end that no American soldier who was injured in this war shall ever feel humiliated, become a beggar on the streets, or become an inmate of a charitable institution. Unless adequate provision is made for them, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Is it proper under the rules to amend this bill to increase the amount to be allowed for each individual's education?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not think there is any question about that. I think so.

Mr. DENISON. I think it ought to be a little bit more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] to the fact that Mr. Munroe, the same man who made the statement the gentleman has quoted, on page 72, and Mr. McIntosh, also, states that it would cost approximately $25,000,000 for the year, and Mr. Munroe said he thought probably that would not be enough. Of course, Mr. Munroe said he did not know anything about it.

Now, I think we ought to act upon this matter in a big way and in a way that will reflect credit upon the Members of this House. I do not believe there has ever been a time since this law was enacted when anybody wanted to deprive a single soldier of this rehabilitation service. Every Member of the House wants to grant every dollar necessary, but after all we must be careful in making these appropriations that we do not invite waste and extravagance all along the line. It is not alone in the payment of salaries that waste will take place. Now, in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. The gentleman says that the President asks for $8,000,000, or rather stated in his message it would require $8,000,000, and therefore he makes his amendment in that amount. Now, I call his attention to the fact there has been appropriated and is already available under the bill which passed the House and Senate and has been signed by the President, amending section 2 of the act, $6,000,000 for this service. This bill carries $6,000,000 for this service; the two bills carry, therefore, $12,000,000. I do not know whether that will be sufficient or not. No man living knows whether it will be sufficient or not. Mr. Munroe, vice president of the board, when he was before the committee on Sunday, when he was asked the following questions by Mr. MAGEE, said:

Mr. MAGEE. The probability is that the average would not exceed 10,000. Do I understand you estimate the number at 20,000?
Mr. MUNROE. It may be 20,000. I do not know.
Mr. MAGEE. You do not know anything about it?
Mr. MUNROE. Nobody can foretell it; nobody knows.

Now, with this service in its infancy, with the desire on the part of Congress to give every dollar that is necessary, I ask the House to be sane and calm and to do that which is the businesslike thing to do; and if at any time there appears that the $12,000,000 will not be sufficient it will take only 48 hours after the estimate has been made to the committee to report out a bill granting all that is required to supply the deficiency. I submit that is the orderly way to proceed—that is the way the business men of the country would have this Congress to proceed; it is the way these soldiers would have us proceed—and not proceed without any estimate before us except the wild statement of what it may cost. If you went on that kind of an estimate, if that side of the House wants to appropriate $12,000,000, they ought to take the responsibility; but I believe this side of the House—that stands for economy, that stands for the elimination of waste [applause]—should say that, even when it comes to appropriating for the soldier, we propose to appropriate the money in a businesslike way—appropriate all that is necessary, but not millions upon millions upon the statement of a man who says, "I do not know how much it will take; no one knows." [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, may I have the attention of the membership for just a moment to see whether we have not some confusion here? The bill as passed from the Committee on Education carried $6,000,000. The sundry civil appropriation bill provided $6,000,000 in lieu of that $6,000,000. That would have left $6,000,000 for the administration of this work this year. The President asked for $2,000,000 additional, which would have made $8,000,000. The law providing $6,000,000 is signed and the money is provided. This asks $6,000,000 more, which is $12,000,000, which is $4,000,000 more than the President asks for, and if I am incorrect I should like to be corrected. That is my understanding after looking into it carefully. We are giving $4,000,000 more than the President asked for in his message.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FESS. I will yield to my friend.
Mr. MADDEN. Who said that?
Mr. FESS. I say it in view——
Mr. MADDEN. Does anybody verify it? [Laughter.]
Mr. FESS. I think I can verify it.
Mr. MADDEN. I do not mean to insinuate——
Mr. FESS. I understand the gentleman.
Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the Committee on Appropriations will attempt to verify it.

Mr. GOOD. That is exactly a correct statement. The gentleman has stated the case correctly. The bill from the Committee on Education which passed carried $6,000,000. If this bill passes in the form it is reported, it will carry $6,000,000, or $12,000,000 in all will be available.

Mr. FESS. In my time let me ask the chairman that if the bill as reported from his committee had been adopted and had become the law we would have had only $6,000,000 for this service?

Mr. GOOD. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. Now we will have $12,000,000. That means $4,000,000 more than the President asked in his veto message, and that is the reason I am willing to support the matter which is before us.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will permit, is it not a fact that the President in his veto message referred to $8,000,000 as covering only subsistence and did not therefore take into consideration the $8,000,000 as covering tuition, travel allowance, medical staff, or administration or anything else?

Mr. FESS. If we had passed the bill under the instructions of the President we would have had $8,000,000. As it is we are having $12,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The President said $8,000,000 would be needed for subsistence for 4,000 men. We are now presented with an entirely different statement for which we are appropriationg not only for subsistence, for tuition, traveling allowance, and so forth, but for a larger number of men.

Mr. FESS. That is true. The fact still remains we are giving the soldiers $4,000,000 more than the President asked for, and it seems to me it is a justifiable reason for passing it.

Mr. MADDEN. But not anything like we ought to appropriate.

Mr. FESS. That might be, but we can easily increase it when demanded.

Mr. DONOVAN. Assuming that to be a fact, of which I have some doubt, and from the gentleman's point of view possibly it is, is it not a fact that the problem which now confronts this board is that it will take a greater amount than $12,000,000?

Mr. FESS. It probably will take more. I think that would be sufficiently cared for under a deficiency bill. But what I am trying to correct is the statement that this bill is not meeting the requirements of the veto message. It goes away beyond the requirement.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does not the President in his message say that this $8,000,000 would only cover under the estimate what the instructors would draw in salary, and says specifically that there will be nothing left for the tuition?

Mr. FESS. Unless you gave the $8,000,000 instead of the $6,000,000.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Did he not say in his message that the $8,000,000 would only pay for tuition and would leave nothing for the operation?

Mr. FESS. I still insist that the bill is going further than the President's suggestion in his veto message.

Mr. GOOD. The concluding paragraph of the President's message contains the following:

I therefore return the bill with the hope that the Congress will reconsider this section of the law, restore the $6,000,000 appropriated under the act amending section 2, and most liberally revise the salary limitations, so that this beneficent work may go on, and go on at once.

And we went even further than that.

Mr. FESS. That would leave $4,000,000 less than we now are granting. I speak in the most thorough sympathy with the efforts for rehabilitation, as every Member knows, and if the $12,000,000 is not enough I shall be one of the first men to urge the committee to vote more. However, it seems to me that this is a very generous allotment from the standpoint of what heretofore was considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I want to see if we can not agree as to the time on this amendment and amendments thereto. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and all amendments thereto, as well as all other amendments as to the amount, be limited to 45 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object——
Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does that include the prohibition of offering an amendment to strike out the words "or any other act," as contained in the proviso?

Mr. GOOD. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, was I included in the schedule of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto, and all amendments fixing the amount contained in the paragraph, shall be limited to 45 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. GOOD. Then I move that all debate on that portion of the bill be limited to 45 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] moves that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto, and all amendments fixing the amount contained in the paragraph, be limited to 45 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. I thank the Chair.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] offered a substitute which I rise to support, and shall give my reasons for it. It is apparent from the hearings that it will take at least $18,000,000. Understand me, I realize that every man on this floor, Democrat and Republican, has voted and will continue to vote to give the wounded soldiers every dollar that they may be entitled to. And all this political talk I do not take any stock in. [Applause.] We are all patriots here. The hearings show that $4,000,000 was the proper amount at the time it was appropriated. The hearings show that $6,000,000 was the sum needed when we came forward with the next appropriation, and the later hearings now show, since the veto, that it will require at least $18,000,000. We understand that it will even take more than that. It is indicated in these hearings that there may be 98,000 of these wounded men. True, Congress can appropriate the money as the occasion arises. There is no intention on the part of any man on either side of this House to curtail that board and its activities. But there is one thing that I shall stand for, and that is a limitation on the salaries of these school-teachers and professors who are in charge of that work. I stand ready to vote every dollar that is necessary to properly teach these men and in order to take care of them and sustain them and pay their traveling expenses, but I believe that the American Congress should not allow salaries of $10,000 and $15,000 and $20,000 a year to be given in the name of patriotism to some $2,500 man to rehabilitate these soldiers and return them to practical life; and I shall vote accordingly, because I believe it is up to this Congress to in some way curtail the wild and extravagant expense that every man can see is going on in this country. [Applause.]

We are here to take care of the soldiers who fought for our country, and we should be here, and I am here, to prevent profiteers demanding enormous salaries as teachers for supposed patriotism, reaching down in the pockets of the taxpayers of this country in the name of the soldier. [Applause.] If we do not curtail the salaries that will be paid for these instructors, you will see them flocking from every quarter of this Republic to get to be instructors of these poor wounded soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. These men can be taught the necessary things to rehabilitate them and fix them for practical life by practical men on reasonable salaries. And when this Congress agrees that the salaries shall be $5,000, $6,000, and $2,500, it seems to me that we ought to stand pat and say that we have some common sense and know what a man's services are worth when engaging in such business.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield. I have only a short time.

The salaries of the Army officers are fixed by Congress; the salaries of all Government officials are fixed by Congress. Why should not this Congress fix the limitation on the men who are to instruct these soldiers? We fix the amount that one of these wounded soldiers is to receive for compensation and to support and maintain him. I desire to see the wounded soldiers get all the benefit of this appropriation, instead of a large part of it being wasted in extravagant salaries for those in charge of the vocational training:

Why not fix the salaries of the men who shall be charged with the responsibility of instructing them? It is the duty of the representatives of the people to stand for the protection and the safeguarding of the taxpayers of this country at the same time that we are upholding the rights of the soldiers and endeavoring to give them that to which they are entitled under every phase of the circumstances and conditions which now surround them. If we are to legislate in the light of past events, we must realize that before we get through with the wounded soldiers our bills are to go up to $100,000,000 for this splendid purpose instead of $18,000,000. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. The Chair will recognize next the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I take it that all of the members of the Committee on Appropriations and all of the Members of the House realize the desire of the country for economy in expenditures, and I take it that we all realize also that while that is the desire of the country it is likewise the desire that such economy shall not be secured under any circumstances at the expense of the soldier, and particularly at the expense of those soldiers who by reason of their services and their disabilities require education and rehabilitation. So the question before us is not one involving a difference of feeling as to the treatment to be given those men, but as to the adoption of the method best calculated to secure to those soldiers and sailors in the fullest degree and most effective manner the assistance which they have earned.

Now, there are those of us who from contact with the Vocational Education Board and the study of the hearings have come to fear that the disgrace and the scandal which have come upon the administration of our relations with the soldiers and their families in connection with the War Risk Insurance Bureau, which during the war by inefficiency of management in thousands of cases denied to the dependents of the boys and withheld from them the money and the aid which Congress voted them, will be repeated in connection with this Vocational Education Board. And that regardless of the amount of money you place in the hands of that board, the only way to secure desired results with the present constitution of that board is for Congress to keep as firm a grip as possible on the situation. In other words, instead of giving unlimited amounts of money to them blindly, simply because one member of that irresponsible board gets up and gives a wild guess—instead of giving them unlimited lumps of money on that ground we should give them the money we are satisfied they must have, and then later on, when the situation develops more clearly and the need is well established, if more is needed give it to them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that board has never yet been able to tell the Committee on Appropriations definitely and tangibly how much they want. More than that, that board does not know to-day what it is doing. They can not tell you to-day what they did yesterday. They can not tell to-day where their offices were yesterday, or where they are to-day.

The city of Detroit is a large city. You might think that a board intrusted with unlimited funds of Government money would be able to tell whether they had in the city of Detroit an office in operation or not; but they appear not to. At any rate, they give out the most contradictory and conflicting statements.

I have here a letter stating that a Michigan soldier, wounded at Chateau-Thierry July 20, 1918, who went to Detroit July 9 to arrange to secure the benefits of vocational training and on arrival there was met with the information that the Detroit office of the board had been closed and that to secure the attention necessary for his enrollment he would have to go to Chicago. That experience being called to the attention of the board in this city the board, through its superintendent of advisement and training, Mr. W. I. Hamilton, wrote a letter to the brother of the soldier acknowledging, in effect, the closing of the Detroit office, saying in substance "the office is closed and you will have to go to Chicago, but we will pay the money to send you to Chicago." That letter was written from the general offices here by a high officer, and a high salaried officer, July 12.

And yet Dr. Prosser, the director of this board, on July 10, one day after the wounded soldier found the office doors barred against him in Detroit, and two days before Mr. Hamilton's letter giving reasons blaming Congress for the closing, gave direct, positive assurance to my colleague, Mr. NICHOLS, who had vigorously brought the matter to his attention, positive assurance that the Detroit office of the board would not be closed. He furthermore on that occasion informed my colleague "that there never has been any intention to close the office and no orders have been sent to close it." To make assurance doubly sure, I am advised, Dr. Prosser called the Chicago office of the board, the district office, by telephone and was informed by the officer in charge there that no such orders had been sent to Detroit from Chicago.

In other words, the office which the wounded soldier found closed on July 9 and was July 12 declared by Mr. Hamilton, superintendent of advisement and training, to have been closed because of the action of Congress, that same office, it was July 10 declared by the director and by the district vocational officer to be then open, never to have been closed, and not intended to be closed.

Such diametrically opposing announcements convict the board of either gross incapacity with resulting confusion in their work or of deliberate insincerity, manifested in deceiving the country to the intended prejudice of Congress. In either case, from such a board, from such management, the interests of the soldiers must suffer. Flinging millions into their care means extravagance and waste. We must act through the agency the administration has named, but we need not follow their ill-considered guesses not supported by proper showing. Every dollar for which proper expenditure can be shown should and will be voted. But to double and quadruple in appropriation any request made, either to us or to the President, is reckless, dangerous, and unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I think it is a very unfortunate matter that such an important subject should be discussed in Congress with nothing injected into it but politics. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] talks about the scandal in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the scandal in other things, and investigations on this and that subject—matters which have no relation whatever to the question of the rehabilitation of these crippled soldiers. If the gentleman and his party keep on investigating and spending money as they have started in their administration of the affairs of this House, the paramount issue in the next Congress will be the investigation of the expenditures of their investigating committees.

The purpose for which I rose mainly was to correct the impression that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] made as to the interpretation of the President's veto of this bill. He said in his statement that the President only asked for $8,000,000. I want for the benefit of the House to read exactly what the President did say in regard to this appropriation, in the RECORD of July 12, in the first column on page 2493. He said:

> The section of the bill which I now return, which governs the appropriation for this work, provides the sum of $6,000,000 for all the expenses of rehabilitation, including the support of the disabled men in training, and this sum is stated to be "in lieu of the appropriation contained in the act approved July —, 1919, amending section 2 of the act approved June 27, 1918." Inasmuch as there are already over 4,000 disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines in training, and inasmuch as another 4,000 will be put into training now that the amendment to section 2 has become law, it is clear that even at the rate of only $80 a month a sum approximating $8,000,000 will be required for the mere support of these men, and that under the present appropriation nothing will be available for their tuition and travel or for placing them where they can earn a living, and it will be impossible to meet the needs of the new thousands who are every week seeking the benefits of the rehabilitation act.

Instead of asking for only $8,000,000, he is stating affirmatively that $8,000,000 will cover only the amount that they allowed, basing it upon $80 a month, for their support. If there is any duty that we owe to those who risked their lives to serve their country, and who came out of the service wounded and maimed, it is to rehabilitate them as much as human brains and human genius can do it. We ought to have the best rehabilitation hospitals of any country in the world, and to give these unfortunate men the benefits of all the brains and all the training and all the advantages that money can buy; and, so far as I am concerned, I am opposed to giving it to them in piecemeals, a few million dollars to-day and a few million dollars more to-morrow. [Applause.] In other words, I am opposed to compelling this Bureau of Vocational Education to come back here every few months begging Congress to appropriate a few million dollars more. The statements of the people in charge of this bureau, who ought to know, are that it is going to cost at least from $18,000,000 to $25,000,000. If these soldiers are to be rehabilitated they ought to be rehabilitated now, and they ought not to have to wait, and the machinery of this work ought not to be paralyzed on account of insufficient appropriations while they come back here and ask for additional money. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] provides for $12,000,000 more in addition to the $6,000,000 already appropriated in the bill from the Committee on Education here a week or two ago, which makes $18,000,000. When these gentlemen who have charge of it say that it will take at least $18,000,000, if we are going to give it to them, why not give it to them now and let the soldiers receive the benefit of it? Because the evidence shows that these men are coming forward and taking advantage of this opportunity by the thousands, and there is no more worthy, eleemosynary institution in the world than this rehabilitation service and these hospitals for these maimed and disabled soldiers, and we ought to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Texas and not make piecemeal of it.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say to the Members of the House that as a member of the subcommittee that made the recommendation to the full Committee on Appropriations, which was adopted by the full committee this morning, I attended the extensive hearing given to those representing the Federal Board of Vocational Education. We gave them what in our judgment will be a liberal amount at least for the balance of this year.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman say that the committee have given them all that it will cost for this fiscal year?

Mr. MAGEE. I will say to the gentleman that nobody can tell that, but refer the gentleman to page 24 of the hearings——

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman willing to admit that there are 14,000 of these men who are now ready for training?

Mr. MAGEE. There are 5,200 now in training, according to the hearings.

Mr. MADDEN. And how many are there waiting?

Mr. MAGEE. As I recall there are some seven or eight thousand more waiting.

Mr. MADDEN. Waiting?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And it will cost $1,400 per year per man, will it not?

Mr. MAGEE. Nobody can tell what it will cost.

Mr. MADDEN. So that it will cost $18,000,000 or $20,000,000 anyway?

Mr. MAGEE. I will call the attention of the gentleman to page 24 of the hearings.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. I can not yield. I am referring to the statements in the hearings.

Mr. CALDWELL. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to something that is not in the hearings.

Mr. MAGEE. This is what Mr. Holder says:

> Mr. HOLDER. We are going through the same experience as an insurance company or a growing concern, and we have not been in business long enough to quote from experience, so that it is impossible to answer your question positively, as much as we would like to do so.
> Mr. MAGEE. That is what I thought. What I had in mind was this: In the first place, that you must be supplied with moneys to meet all reasonable needs. Everybody concedes that. Now then, if an appropriation should be made that is not sufficient for the purpose, Congress at any time, I am sure, would willingly respond and give you additional moneys. It seems to me we ought to try to work together, and work together along those lines. I do not like the intimation being thrown out that the Members of Congress are not willing to vote to give all the moneys that are reasonably necessary or all the moneys that may be required to fulfill these purposes. I do not like that. It seems to me no spirit of that sort should exist, and any talk or intimation of that sort is the cheapest kind of claptrap, political claptrap, you might call it. I do not like that, and I do not think it is warranted. I think we ought to get down to some reasonable basis, if we can, with the understanding that the men who are carrying on this great work will get all the moneys they will require for the purpose. That is my judgment about it.

Now, if you will turn to page 73 of the hearings you will find there further suggestions along this line.

> Mr. MAGEE. You do not know anything about it?
> Mr. MUNROE. Nobody can foretell it; nobody knows.
> Mr. MAGEE. It is a matter of guesswork?
> Mr. MUNROE. Absolutely.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MAGEE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman know how many men there are in hospitals who have not made application yet for the rehabilitation training?

Mr. MAGEE. The number is estimated in the hearings.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will tell the gentleman. It is between 50,000 and 100,000.

Mr. MAGEE. We should not appropriate any greater amount of money than is reasonably necessary to enable the Federal Board for Vocational Education to carry on this work. I think it will be apparent to any Member of the House who reads these hearings that we ought to retain some control of these salaries and put some limitation upon them. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy of the Chair and of the committee in granting me time when I have already spoken once.

As I stated earlier to-day, the problem which confronts us here is a definite, ascertainable problem, and it has its solution. There are gentlemen here who embark in oratory and flights of fancy and who waive us aside, but the fact is that there are a definite number of men now in training and ready for training. There are 13,757 men, or substantially 14,000 men. Last month there were submitted for training 150 men a day. This month, in July, there have been approved for training 76 men a day. The Committee on Appropriations say that the right amount can not be definitely arrived at by computation. Now, gentlemen criticize the Board for Vocational Training. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] said—I do not know what the adjective was he used, but it was not complimentary, it was undeserved and unfair; but do these men on the Appropriations Committee, does the chairman with his vast knowledge of minute and infinitesimal things pertaining to the departments in the Government—does the gentleman know how much this is to cost? He does not pretend to make a prophecy. Where are you going to get the tangible figures to approximate, if you want to be generous and fair? You are going to the Vocational Board for the estimate. In the next six months, from indications now available, there will be 14,136 men plus 13,000 men now in training. It is simply a matter of mathematical computation—multiply 14,136 by $1,400 a year for training and subsistence and you have the answer.

This country last year paid $222,000,000 for pensions. You know that this will alleviate and reduce pensions relative to the World War.

Another point overlooked by the Appropriations Committee is that they gave to the War Risk Insurance Bureau an appropriation of $8,800,000 for the support of these same men. Now, this is nothing but a marshaling of funds from the War Risk Insurance under section 2 and placing it with the Vocational Board for Education and Training. Do not lose sight of that fact, and if you do adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, for $12,000,000 in addition to the $6,000,000, you are then only giving a part of what is actually needed to successfully carry on the great work.

Are you going to give these needed funds in piecemeal? When the Appropriations Committee recommends $6,000,000 do they do it out of any generosity of the heart? Why did they send for the board to get an estimate if they could get any better sort of one? Why bother with this tyrannical incompetent board of vocational educators? Why did the committee send for them? They took advantage of the board's requirement as stated, and they lopped off $2,000,000 from the $6,000,000 requested. Do you want to continue that? It is a problem of mathematics and very elementary. There is no man here whether he is educated or not—it is elementary, it is a problem of mathematical progression. The money is needed to maintain this project and you must give it or wipe out the whole system. I trust that the House will adopt the Buchanan amendment because it is the nearest amount to meet the financial requirement for the work to be done, and if you do it you will be doing only partial justice. You will then be giving only $18,000,000 as against $222,000,000 which is given in pensions for the past wars of our Nation.

This is not to continue indefinitely. It is presumed that it will terminate in three years. Last month there came to this country 365,000 men demobilized, and among those were a great list of casuals. There is no man, there is not any human being, who can tell absolutely how many of these men will come for this training. By reason of your act here in increasing the allowance for support during training from $75 to $80 and $100, you have made it more attractive to the soldiers. They came home from overseas and many of them went immediately to their homes. Now, you have made it attractive by increasing the amount so they can decently support their families while they themselves are away at training. They have had their home welcome. They are now coming back in great numbers to report for training and it thus increases this work. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when the President left this country to return to France, just after the adjournment of the last Congress, he made a public statement in which he criticized the action of the Senate in failing to pass some of the largest supply bills, and called attention particularly to the failure of Congress to pass the appropriation for the Railroad Administration. He pointed out how critical was the financial condition of the Railroad Administration, but he made no mention of the failure to pass the bill containing the provision for the Board for Vocational Education.

Now, when the new appropriation bill for the Railroad Administration came before Congress last month the estimate was for $1,200,000,000, if I remember right. The Director General said that amount was necessary. The appropriation that was carried in the bill was only $750,000,000, or $450,000,000 less than the amount estimated by the Railroad Administration as actually necessary for the railroads. And yet the President approved that bill and signed it, without any protest or complaint.

I am unable to reconcile his action in approving that bill, which was $450,000,000 short of the amount estimated to be absolutely necessary, with his action in returning this bill with a veto simply because he thought it was somewhat less than the amount estimated to be necessary.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. BEE. Does not the gentleman see the difference between an inanimate railroad and a mangled human soldier?

Mr. DENISON. The President in his statement when he left the country in March called attention to the critical condition of the railroads as the result of the failure of the Senate to pass the railroad appropriation bill; but he did not mention this question, and taking the President's own statement for it, I am sure the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and his committee have not been trying to economize at all at the expense of the wounded soldiers of the country, and everyone here knows he has not been doing so. The bill we passed carried $6,000,000 for vocational education, an amount sufficient to answer all the demands for many months to come, if not for the entire year. Yes, of course there is a difference between railroads and mangled soldiers, but that is entirely irrelevant to the question. Evidently there are some who have thought there was at least a difference in their votes and political influence.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. No; I have not the time. I do not think the committee have been trying to economize at the expense of anyone. They have been simply trying to use good business judgment in the matter of making appropriations. For that I think the committee should be commended.

But the President by his veto of this bill has put the Members of the House in the attitude of not doing their full duty to the wounded soldiers. Everyone knows that is not the case, and to that extent the President has done the Members of Congress an injustice. And, so far as I am concerned, I am not going to let the President get by with any deal of that kind. I am going to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. I am willing to give to the wounded soldiers every dollar that can be wisely expended for their benefit. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas provides several million dollars more for the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers than the President has recommended, but I shall vote for it just the same.

I have not said a word in the House recently, in fact, not anything at all, as to what I would do for the wounded soldiers. I do not believe much in talking along that line. I think we would better act rather than talk. Talk is cheap; and making a political football out of the wounded soldier's cause ought to be beneath our dignity. In the arrangement made here in the House since the Republicans came into control, I am allowed one little job at $1,200 a year as a matter of patronage, and I am bringing a young man here to take that job who lost his right arm at Chateau-Thierry. He is a right-handed man, and he has to learn how to write again with his left hand. I think he will be out here in the document room. You gentlemen of the House who go there will sooner or later see him. He may be a little awkward at first and unable to perform all of his duties as gracefully as others would, but when he comes I bespeak for him that kindly consideration which I am sure all of the Members of the House are willing to give to one whose right arm lies buried under the sod of France—a sacrifice for you and for me. I am going to do that to show my appreciation for the men who have come back from the war wounded, and I think that is about as substantial a way of doing it as either getting up here on the floor of the House and making a long, noisy speech, telling them what a friend you are to the soldiers, or sending a veto message here trying to put the Members of the House, who have been honestly economizing and making appropriations upon a sound business basis, in the attitude of not being willing to do all that ought to be done for the soldiers when that is not the fact. [Applause.]

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand why the President has been subjected to so much criticism on the floor of this House for vetoing the sundry civil appropriation bill when his action is indorsed by the very House itself or will be through the bringing in of an amendment by the Committee on Appropriations of $6,000,000 more for vocational education than the sundry civil bill carried when it passed. The admission is thereby made by such critics that they did not realize the necessities for caring for this vocational training.

I want to read a few extracts from the statement of Mr. Munroe, vice chairman of the Vocational Board, in his testimony before the Appropriations Committee, since the veto, as to the amount that is necessary:

Consequently these men to whom we are already obligated for their support and tuition fees will be $1,400 a year which multiplied by 14,000 is somewhere, as I figure it, about $18,000,000 required merely for the board, lodging, and tuition of these men. Now, that makes no provision for their medical care. A great many of them, of course, will need very careful care. It makes no provision for their supervision while they are in this course of training and, as you know, gentlemen, we have to very carefully supervise their courses to see that they are carried out as we have planned them to be. It makes no provision for the necessary travel which many of them must take from one place to another. It makes no provision for the administration of a work of this size and there is nothing left absolutely for taking up the problem of the thousands and thousands of other men who have already been surveyed up to the number of 98,000. That is, we have placed under the system 12,000, we are obligated to train about 14,000, that makes 26,000, and in addition to that there are 76,000 men who have been surveyed and whose cases must be followed up as quickly as possible. We have registered a total of 147,000 cases, of which there are 49,000 men who have never been followed up at all and who must be followed up at once. The estimate is that there are probably 60,000 or 70,000 more men still in hospitals and still in the field, and many of those are passibly not on our rolls at all.

Consequently, gentlemen, the figures that we have ahead of us, as we have told you repeatedly, are figures that no one could foresee. We are growing every day. The average number of cases that is being acted upon every day by our district offices is 150, which has to be added to the figure I have already given you. No one can foresee the size of this problem during the coming year.

As we have said repeatedly at the hearings before your committee and to Members of both Houses, we take it for granted that when Congress passed this legislation in June, 1918, they proposed that this job should be done not only thoroughly but that it should be done promptly, and that no disabled boy should be kept waiting for more than a reasonable length of time before he should be put into training.

This House can not afford not to give this appropriation for this training, because the board needs it now. We contemplate getting back the last of all of these wounded men, ready to be examined by this board, in a few months, and the strain upon the resources of the Vocational Board will come within that time. It does not behoove Congress to say that this board shall be hampered by a lack of money; that the Congress shall be hesitant about offering these men the facilities they need to become reconstructed.

When the very life of this Nation was at stake and the liberties and safety not only of our own citizens but of those of the allied world were in jeopardy, the American soldiers, sailors, and marines did not hesitate to offer their lives as a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom. Neither they nor those who held them dear refused to have their lives and safety appropriated in defense of civilization and all that mankind cherishes and values highest; and yet it seems that a Republican majority of this House is refusing to appropriate now the dollars that are necessary to give the Americans who suffered wounds in this war the right and opportunity to be restored physically, and to a life of usefulness when peace has come upon us.

It is a strange doctrine of economy—stranger, too, when it is remembered that scarcely eight months ago every dollar and resource of this Nation was pledged to a process of destruction. No one clamored then for false economies, because they realized that it was no time for such action; that this country would have no patience with it, and that the safety of this land and of civilization could not be jeopardized by a failure to appropriate money enough for cannon, ammunition, rifles, battleships, submarines, destroyers, and articles of every kind which either might or could prove useful in winning the war.

But now, when we come to the period of peace and are embarked upon the processes of restoration of our wounded and are endeavoring to provide hospitals, schools and training, and agencies of every kind to build up and re-create the wounded and shattered American soldiers, sailors, and marines, it ill befits a grateful Nation to indulge in practices of economy at the expense of such heroes; and such action will not be regarded by the people of this land as any real economy, but will be taken and looked upon as a badge of humiliation and shame.

It is one thing to try to make a record of economy; it is quite another to overlook in so doing the priceless generosity and sacrifices made by the young manhood of America in the fearful World War.

I believe that the people of the United States will have no sympathy and no patience with plausible excuses and reasons why an adequate appropriation of money for this vocational work was not made. It will not do to take refuge in realms of skepticism and doubt as to the wisdom of providing the Vocational Board now with sufficient funds to give these wounded boys every chance and every facility to be as fully restored as they can be to begin all over again the task of earning an honest living in the field of civil life.

The Nation not only owes them this; it owes them more. The debt can never be paid. The memory of the heroic deeds of these men will never fade from the pages of history, and will always be enshrined in the hearts of the families, mothers and fathers, wives and children, and their fellow countrymen.

In every one of the millions of homes throughout this land that gave some one of the family to the service of their country there will be preserved with tender and affectionate care the uniforms and symbols of service of those who were enlisted in the service of their country. They will always be precious mementos of the unsurpassed courage and valor of the American soldiers, sailors, and marines who came from the city and from the country, from the farm and from the store, from the school and from the industries; in fact, from every walk of our complex civil life; who loving the arts of peace rather than those of war, yet cheerfully subjected themselves to the severest kind of training and discipline and became the greatest fighters in the world.

Their deeds of supreme bravery, their glorious successes on land and sea, their willingness to endure without complaint the hardships, dangers, and suffering daily encountered, will always constitute a record of which their fellow countrymen will never cease to be proud.

In the crucial and thrilling engagements at St. Mihiel, Chateau-Thierry, and Belleau Wood, where the American soldiers and marines checked for the first time the crushing advance of the German armies and hurled them back with such overwhelming force that the ultimate destruction of the Hun forces was assured, the world and civilization felt for the first time in many weary months its anxiety vanish, and became convinced that right, truth, and justice would prevail.

I wish that time and opportunity were now accorded me to refer in more detail to those glorious and wonderful campaigns in France and Belgium and in other lands, and to make a fuller mention of the indispensable service and memorable triumphs of the Navy in driving the German submarine from the sea and transporting to France in safety over 2,000,000 American soldiers and marines. Their heroic deeds and sacrifices, however, do not have to be recalled to the loved ones of these men or to their countrymen. They are too deeply embedded in the hearts of all to ever be forgotten.

But in treasuring such a record of imperishable fame and glory as these heroes have given America, it would be unworthy beyond expression to forget the needs and welfare of the men who made it.

Every wound and every disability sustained by them in the service of their country is a badge of signal honor and distinction. But in the struggle for existence they are also serious handicaps.

As far as is humanly possible, the Nation must restore them, and restore them now, to a state of health and economic independence. They are not objects of charity, will never be so regarded, and ought not to be. All the money that is needed should be generously appropriated, and appropriated now, when the need is greatest for restoration and training for the various occupations they may be able to follow.

It is not surprising that the members of the Vocational Board should not be able to estimate with absolute certainty the exact amount of money which will be needed in the next 12 months to educate, train, and support the wounded and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines who are entitled to the benefits of the vocational act. When it is considered that 230,074 men were actually disabled by wounds in battle, and that another vast number, yet undetermined, were disabled by disease, exposure, and illness during the war, all of whom are entitled to the benefits of treatment, training, and support under the provisions of this act, it is apparent that it is impossible for the Vocational Board to state with certainty what the precise financial needs of the board will be in order to admit to such training, when they apply, all those who are entitled to receive it.

It is not sufficient to excuse an adequate appropriation now, to urge that a serious deficiency can be taken care of later when it develops.

When the recent amendment to the vocational act was passed by Congress in January it carried an appropriation of $6,000,000 for the board. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. GOOD] sought, when the bill was before the House, to have that appropriation stricken out upon the ground that an adequate and sufficient amount of $4,000,000 had already been provided in the sundry civil bill, passed by the House, and then before the Senate. But the House of Representatives refused to agree with the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee and insisted upon appropriating the additional $6,000,000 in the vocational act, in addition to the $4,000,000 carried in the sundry civil bill, making the total appropriation for vocational training amount to $10,000,000 in all.

When the sundry civil bill went to conference between the House and Senate the conference reported back to Congress a provision increasing the amount for vocational training in the sundry civil bill from four to six million dollars; in that provision, however, was included a clause repealing the $6,000,000 appropriation carried in the vocational bill. It was due to the erroneous conclusion at that time of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and to his representation to the House that $6,000,000 was all that the Appropriations Committee had found was needed by the Vocational Board. The sundry civil bill, in spite of its urgency, was finall passed.

The President of the United States, however, vetoed the sundry civil bill, because he found that the sum of $6,000,000 was totally inadequate and the limitations on the administrative features of the vocational bill altogether too severe.

After such veto message was presented to Congress the Appropriations Committee held additional hearings, and in those it was disclosed that the very least amount which the board would need for the next 12 months was $18,000,000.

Now, while the Appropriations Committee has consented to allow the board to retain the $6,000,000 appropriated for it in June, but taken from it in the sundry civil bill, and increases such sum by proposing to allow another $6,000,000, making a total appropriation of $12,000,000 in all for the fiscal year ending in 1920, yet it now appears from this very recent testimony before the Appropriations Committee that this amount will fall short by $6,000,000 of the least amount actually needed to pay for the board, lodging, and tuition of the men already in training and whose applications have already been approved.

In other words, the least amount needed now is $18,000,000. If the Buchanan amendment is adopted, this sum will be provided; but if this amendment is defeated, in my opinion it will mean serious denial to thousands who need this training now more than they will ever need it at any other time and when its benefits will be the greatest.

Let Congress show by its acts as well as by its words that it values beyond price the services and sacrifices which the American soldier, sailor, and marine made for his country, humanity, and the safety and liberties of all, and that it means to deal most generously with those who are wounded and disabled in helping them back to a life of further service and usefulness and to an opportunity to face the world again upon an equal plane with their more fortunate fellow men. The adoption of the Buchanan amendment will be a step in the right direction, but its defeat will, to say the least, indicate rather a spirit of indifference or false economy that the Nation will resent and not forget when it calls upon its public servants for an accounting and an explanation as to how they have discharged the trusts committed to their care. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to speak upon the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may not be confused as to the status of the appropriation for this service, I want to refer to the statement made while the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] was on the floor. The only estimate made through the Secretary of the Treasury as required by law was the estimate for $4,000,000 for the whole year. Subsequently a letter was written to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations increasing this to $6,000,000, and this was subsequently reduced by the board to $2,500,000. Congress enacted a law amending section 2 of the act, carrying $6,000,000, so that if there had been no further action by Congress the Vocational Board now would have for the next year $6,000,000 in addition to the $2,000,000 appropriated by the original act. The $2,000,000 was all used before the end of the fiscal year or by that time. Congress by this bill gives $6,000,000 more, or $12,000,000, which is $8,000,000 in excess of the actual estimate of the department.

I want the Members of the House to remember that in order to give the Committee on Appropriations jurisdiction in the orderly way it is necessary for the Secretary of the Treasury to send an estimate to the Speaker of the House that so much money is required for a given service. No such additional estimate has been made. Let us not cheapen the soldier, let us not cheapen ourselves, by voting for an appropriation that has never been estimated for by anyone.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. For a question.

Mr. RUCKER. How much does it cost per soldier for the term of 10 months?

Mr. GOOD. The facts are that while a great deal of loose talk has been going around as to what it is going to cost to rehabilitate a soldier no one knows. Some of them are in training for 10 days and some of them are in training for 4 years. The statement was made that it would cost $1,400 per year, if they were in that long.

Mr. RUCKER. Has not the gentleman some idea of the number now in training and the number at the door waiting to enter; and if the gentleman has that information, why can not this House multiply the one by the other and make the appropriation, whether it is estimated for or not?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that is a fair question, and you could do it if you knew whether or not they would be there 10 days or——

Mr. RUCKER rose.

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield further.

Mr. RUCKER. It would not be used.

Mr. GOOD. The director said on Sunday it would take about six weeks to educate a barber to perform those duties. Now, are you going to give him training for a whole year? He said it would take several months to educate a carpenter. Are you going, now, to give training or the money for training for a whole year and pay that much, when it can not be stated until the service or training is completed? I undertake to say this service ought to be done now. These boys ought to be rehabilitated now and not wait until they are older men. There is no disposition in any way to stop this work. I want to encourage them to give the training as rapidly as possible to these men, but I want to say to the House that we ought to act sanely. When this matter was up before the Committee on Appropriations not a Member objected because the amount was not high enough. No one, so far as I know, was displeased with regard to this amount. It is $8,000,000 more than the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is $4,000,000 more than the amount estimated by the President himself, and the only statement that is made here with regard——

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield. The only statement then made was made by Mr. Munroe, who says, "We do not know; our limited experience will not permit us to state whether or not this will cost $18,000,000 or $25,000,000, or how much it will cost." All Mr. Munroe asked, so far as I am advised, was that the appropriation of $4,000,000 be restored. He did not ask even for the $6,000,000 that the committee has reported. The committee thought that perhaps there might be a recess and it was willing to give at least two-thirds of the maximum guessed at to carry this service well into next year before it would be necessary to take further action. But the Committee on Appropriations so far as I am concerned will be entirely satisfied with whatever action the House may take upon this matter. I know that every Member of the House is interested in the rehabilitation of these boys. They ought to be interested, but at the same time we ought to make our appropriations in a way that when we go before our constituents we can say to them that we did not give more money than was reasonably estimated for the service.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. WHEELER. After the deduction of salaries under this bill which is now under consideration what will be left for the benefit of the soldier boys, roughly speaking?

Mr. GOOD. The amount estimated here in the letter I read to-day is $3,488,000 for salaries. The limitation put in the bill will effect a saving, as I recall, of about $100,000.

Mr. WHEELER. Three million dollars for teachers——

Mr. GOOD. No; this is for employees and does not refer to teachers. I do not know to what extent that will reflect in the employment of other persons. I do not know and nobody knows whether it will be necessary to have all of those at present employed. Dr. Prosser stated last February the 1st day of June this part of the work would commence to decline and he would commence to discharge these men in six months. That was the peak load, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] stated when the matter was before the House, but Dr. Prosser stated then that the work would be at its height about the month of June. And so I do not know how long it is going to take. No man knows how long it will take to do the work or how many of this force that is estimated for here will be on the pay roll all the balance of the year. Here is what he said:

It must be remembered that this is temporary service and that many of these employees will finish their service within the next six months.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired by direction of the committee.

The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that be divided. It is in two parts.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to dividing it.

Mr. KREIDER. May it be reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the Clerk to report the first part of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let it all be read, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARD. Can it not all be read?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman mean now?

Mr. GARD. Yes; for our information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN as a substitute for the Madden amendment: Amend the bill by striking out the figures "$6,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$12,000,000"; and add, at the end of the provision, after the word "each," the following provision, to wit: "And provided further, That not more than 18 per cent of all appropriations made by Congress on this subject shall be used for the payment of salaries."

The CHAIRMAN. The question first to be decided is upon the amount, which I will ask the Clerk to read to the House under the order of the separation.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order to discuss that division of the proposed question?

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has ended.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to discuss that and two or three other matters incident to it for two or three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first part of the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the figures "$6,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$12,000,000."

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GOOD. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 96.

Mr. CALDWELL. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I think some gentlemen in the House probably should know what they are voting on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 120, noes 119.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote now comes on the second part of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. FESS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. With 120 for and 119 against, if the Chair would vote against it, the amendment would fail? Did the Chair vote?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not vote on this unless he passes between the tellers. [Applause.] The Clerk will report the second part of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the provision, after the word "each," the following provision, to wit:

"And provided further, That not more than 18 per cent of all appropriations made by Congress on this subject shall be used for the payment of salaries."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendment to what?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one amendment pending. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 104, noes 136.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. GOOD and Mr. BUCHANAN to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 136, noes 139.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I ask the Clerk to report.

Mr. MADDEN. I move, Mr. Chairman, an amendment to strike out the "$6,000,000" and make it "$9,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FESS: After the word "this" strike out the words "or any other."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, in the seventh line from the bottom——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to have the gentleman from Ohio yield in order to have it read. There is no conflict between us. I think the amendment would be accepted by the committee.

Mr. FESS. I yield for the reading of the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: After the word "this" in the proviso, strike out the words "or any other," add a comma and the additional words "and the act approved July —, 1919, amending section 2 of the act of June 27, 1918."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the proviso or the explanatory phrase or clause given by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] just identifies the law that we want to preserve, and I would have no objection to accepting that explantory statement in connection with the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. GOOD. I would like to know just what is in the mind of the gentleman in regard to the effect this provision will have that will be cured by the amendment, whichever one is adopted.

Mr. FESS. I will state to the chairman and to the members of the committee that the Smith-Hughes vocational bill, approved June 27, 1918, carries an annual appropriation, when it is at its maximum, of $7,000,000, to be administered by the Federal Government, in connection with a similar amount to be supplied by the various States; and in order to administer this amount the Vocational Board has divided the United States into 15 vocational districts, over each of which there is a director, and these 15 directors have a salary now fixed at $3,500 each; and the limitation in the bill we are now acting upon is limited to the rehabilitation of the soldiers, while this goes on to this act and will embarrass 15 regional directors, 2 assistants to the board, and in all 22 members that I do not believe the committee wanted to touch at all.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. GOOD. The amendment as it is drawn, I understand, will make this provision in the appropriation of $6,000,000 carried in the bill amending section 2 amenable to the limitation?

Mr. FESS. It will.

Mr. GOOD. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I am very much obliged.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, would not my substitute be voted on first?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's substitute be voted upon instead of the amendment that I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute will be voted on instead of the original.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the amendment be read first.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: After the word "this" strike out the words "or any other," and after the word "act" insert the words "or the act approved July —, 1919, amending section 2 of the act approved June 27, 1918," so that as amended the language will read "Provided, That no person (except the members of the Federal Board for Vocational Education) shall be paid by said board out of the appropriation contained in this act or the act approved July —, 1919, amending section 2 of the act approved June 27, 1918, at a rate of compensation exceeding $2,500 per annum," etc.

Mr. GOOD. There is no objection to that.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I am somewhat confused on that. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether he is sure that the wording of his explanatory clause will extend to the Smith-Hughes bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it specifically excludes the operation of this proviso from any effect on the original Smith-Hughes Act, and limits this restriction of salary to the act which we are now passing and the act amending section 2.

Mr. FESS. We do not want this limitation to extend to the Smith-Hughes Act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I am seeking to exclude by my substitute.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. Is the vote being taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama as a substitute or as an amendment? I understood that the gentleman offered it as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. As a substitute. Those in favor of the amendment as now presented will signify it by saying aye.

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. I think in view of that amendment it is not necessary, unless I have misunderstood the force of the amendment, to retain the words which are in parentheses—

(Except the members of the Federal Board for Vocational Education.)

Mr. BANKHEAD. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. GOOD. I move to strike out the words included in the parentheses—

(Except the members of the Federal Board for Vocational Education.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: After the word "persons" in the proviso strike out the words in the parentheses—"(except the members of the Federal Board for Vocational Education)."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to amend the figures "$6,000,000" by striking them out and inserting in lieu thereof "$9,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Strike out "$6,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$9,000,000."

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for a division.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I want recognition for the purpose of offering a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the gentleman on his feet asking recognition?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I move to amend by striking out the word "nine" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Mr. MADDEN. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KINCHELOE offers a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN by striking out "$9,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$10,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. KINCHELOE) there were—ayes 116, noes 154.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. GOOD and Mr. KINCHELOE.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 123, noes 148.

Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to strike out "$6,000,000" and insert "$9,000,000."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 126, noes 151.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$6,000,000" and insert "$7,500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Strike out "$6,000,000" and insert "$7,500,000."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were 104 ayes and 159 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$6,000,000" and insert "$6,500,000."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's motion is dilatory. He has offered amendments in several amounts and they have all been voted down.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the Chair will undertake to sustain any such point of order as that.

Mr. WALSH. The Chair will rule on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. Are there any other amendments to be offered?

Mr. SABATH. Upon what ground does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the ground that it is dilatory. The amount that the gentleman has moved to insert is between the two amounts voted down.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were 163 ayes and 83 noes.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

During the reading the following occurred:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is possible for the Clerk to read a page of this bill in less than six seconds. I expect the bill to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading in order.

Subsequently:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the Clerk turning over four or five pages of manuscript while he reads one. I have been watching.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed in order.

Subsequently:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the pages being read that were turned over. I protest. I want it distinctly understood that as a Member of this House I have rights here. I do not propose to let the Chair sit complacently by and permit that thing to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will call attention to any particular part of the bill that has not been read, the Chair will see that it is read.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not propose to allow the Chairman to permit the Clerk to turn over five or six pages of manuscript without reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Labor, pursuant to section 1 of the act approved March 4, 1913, entitled "An act to create a Department of Labor," to continue to foster, promote, to develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, to advance their opportunities for profitable employment by maintaining a national system of employment offices in the several States and political subdivisions thereof, and to coordinate the public employment offices throughout the country by furnishing and publishing information as to opportunities for employment, and by maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and for their actual necessary traveling expenses while absent from their official station, together with their per diem in lieu of subsistence, when allowed, pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act, approved August 1, 1914, supplies and equipment, telegraph and telephone service, and printing and binding, $400,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this section for the reason that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill and that there is no legislation passed by this Congress authorizing such an appropriation. I call attention of the Chair to the fact that every Chairman during this Congress has sustained this point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order comes too late. No points of order have been reserved on the bill.

Mr. BLANTON Mr. Chairman, I insist that it is not too late. I understand it is the usual custom for some chairman of a committee, or some gentleman, when a bill is reported, to reserve all points of order. I am reliably informed, by an authority that I consider good from a parliamentary standpoint, that it is not necessary and that there is no purpose or reason whatever for reserving points of order, because any Member of the House has the right and privilege to make a point of order upon the conclusion of the reading of any paragraph in the bill. I submit that that is parliamentary law.

I call attention further to the fact that the bill was brought in here under a rule of the committee. It is not printed, and not a Member of the House has an opportunity to know what it contains. If a Member calls for a copy of it, it is impossible to get one. I submit that the point of order should be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that unless there is a reservation under circumstances of this kind a point of order can not be entertained to a part or a section of the bill. It seems to the Chair clear that points of order must be reserved, else it is the duty of the committee to report the bill as it is. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7343, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is considered ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the amendments will be put en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. At what stage of the proceedings will it be in order to move to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. After the third reading. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON, Mr. BUCHANAN, and Mr. MADDEN rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am against the bill, and I desire to make a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not a Member of the House who is against the bill the privilege first of offering a motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The gentleman need not make that inquiry. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to offer a motion to recommit?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Any bill that fails to provide for the disabled soldiers of this country—that does not do it adequately—I am opposed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not answer the question. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion to recommit offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: "I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to immediately report the same back to the House with the following amendment to the paragraph providing for vocational rehabilitation:

"First, strike out the figures '$6,000,000' and insert in lieu thereof the figures '$12,000,000,' and by adding at the end of the paragraph immediately after the word 'each' the following, to wit: That not more than 18 per cent of all appropriations made by Congress on this subject shall be used for the payment of salaries."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the motion to recommit made by the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is voted down an amendment will be in order; otherwise not. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRISP) there were—ayes 103, noes 131.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-two Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the previous question was rejected.

Mr. GOOD rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer as a substitute for the motion to recommit, that the figures "$12,000,000" be stricken out and the figures "$6,500,000" be inserted in lieu thereof, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has moved the previous question on his amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. He can not make both motions at once, can he?

The SPEAKER. He can not. He makes first one and then the other. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Is an amendment to the substitute now in order?

The SPEAKER. Not after the previous question is ordered. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa to the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Good amendment may be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] asks unanimous consent that the Good amendment be again reported. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is a substitute instead of an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GOOD moves as a substitute to the motion offered by Mr. BUCHANAN to strike out "$12,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,500,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the substitute I offered was to strike out $6,000,000 and put in $6,500,000. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what are we voting on?

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. CANNON. I want to find out what we are voting on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just asked the Clerk to report the amendment. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GOOD offers as a substitute to the motion to recommit by striking out——

Mr. GOOD sent the written amendment to the Clerk's desk. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa be reduced to writing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see that the House has fair play. The House will be in order and gentlemen will be seated. The Clerk will report the amendment originally offered by the gentleman from Iowa. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GOOD moves as a substitute to the motion to recommit to strike out "$12,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,500,000."

[Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. The substitute I offered was reduced to writing by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] at my request. I read it from the table instead of sending it to the desk, and if any mention was made—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. GOOD. If any mention was made of $12,000,000 it was an inadvertence. [Cries of "Yes!"]

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman said $6,000,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry. Could I withdraw——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I object to a withdrawal of it.

The SPEAKER. In the committee a Member has not a right to change his amendment, but in the House a gentleman has——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. I grant a man has a right to withdraw his amendment or motion in the House before the House has taken action on it, but here the previous question has been ordered and it cuts off any other amendment or right to withdraw the amendment. Here is a motion made to recommit. I know the Speaker is fair, I know the Speaker wants to do right. Now, this is a simple matter. If the gentleman from Iowa got himself in a hole it is not the province of the Speaker to pull him out. [Applause.] The gentleman from Texas offered a motion to recommit, which was clearly in order under the rules of the House. That motion provided that the committee should report the bill back instanter appropriating $12,000,000 for the rehabilitation of indigent soldiers, and the gentleman from Iowa offered a substitute—and the Speaker knows a substitute is nothing in the world but an amendment—now, the gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which is denominated a substitute providing for striking out $12,000,000 and inserting $6,500,000. He could not strike out $6,000,000 because it was not in the motion; $12,000,000 was in it. It provides for striking out that and puts in $6,500,000, and on that he demanded the previous question. The House has ordered the previous question. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the gentleman to strike out $12,000,000 and insert $6,500,000, and the Speaker had directed the calling of the roll. And certainly under those conditions the gentleman can not now withdraw his amendment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] had offered an amendment to strike out "$6,000,000" in the bill and insert "$12,000,000." I have offered a substitute to strike out "$6,000,000" and insert "$6,500,000." [Cries of "No, no!"] Mr. Speaker, I want to be fair with the House. What I said in offering the substitute was to strike out "$12,000,000" and corrected myself by saying "$6,000,000." And the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] and others who were standing near me here heard perfectly what I said and will verify this statement. I had the substitute as prepared by Mr. WALSH lying on my desk while I was reading from it, and that will speak for itself.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KREIDER. To make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to offer a substitute to strike figures out of a bill that are not contained in it? If there is "$6,000,000" in the bill, the gentleman can not offer a substitute to strike out "$12,000,000."

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he must be bound by the record as reported by the Clerk, and if the amendment which is before the House is the amendment as reported by the Clerk——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, if the Clerk reported what the gentleman did not say——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman sent it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. NOLAN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is mistaken. The Chair understood that the Clerk reported what was sent up to the desk.

Mr. CRISP. May I respectfully ask the Speaker to have the Reporter read his notes?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to have the Reporter read his notes.

Mr. GARNER. That is all right.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. CALDWELL. The point of order I make is that it is too late to reconsider, because a roll call has already been ordered on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CALDWELL. The yea-and-nay vote has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order to move to reconsider.

Mr. NOLAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, my parliamentary inquiry is this: Is the substitute for a motion to recommit in order unless it is reduced to writing?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized it. The Chair, with the permission of the House, will have the Reporter's notes read.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the Chair answer my parliamentary inquiry? Does not the rule require that the motion to recommit must be reduced to writing?

Mr. CRISP. I never heard of that rule. I wish the gentleman would cite me to it.

The SPEAKER. The House will please preserve order. The Chair recognizes the excitement and the lateness of the hour, but the Chair also recognizes that all men on both sides want exact justice to be done.

The Chair will follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and have the Reporter's notes read, and, as he stated before, will abide by them. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer as a substitute for the motion to recommit that the figures "$12,000,000" be stricken out and the figures "$6,500,000" be inserted in lieu thereof, and on that I demand the previous question.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to reconsider the motion by which the previous question was ordered.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. This was offered as a substitute. Must not the substitute go to the part that is originally recommitted and can not as a substitute amend the recommitment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. GARNER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker. We will never get through here without the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to reconsider the vote whereby the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WINGO. The yeas and nays have been ordered. It is too late. It is too late to reconsider.

Mr. GARNER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had forgotten that. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to reconsider the vote.

Mr. WINGO. No. The yeas and nays have been ordered. It is too late for the vote to be reconsidered. The yeas and nays were asked for and sustained.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, you can move to reconsider.

Mr. WINGO. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the roll call was ordered. It is too late.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order. Make those men sit down over there. Get the Sergeant at Arms out.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, may we have order on the Democratic side? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The question is——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the action by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CRISP. I would like to make this point of order, to find out if the gentleman voted, ordering the yeas and nays on the previous question.

Mr. GOOD. I did.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order that unless he voted with the prevailing side he can not make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. GOOD. I remember that I was one of the persons who stood up on this side asking for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to get recognition for some time.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. It is this, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. There is already a point of order pending. You can not make another while that is pending.

Mr. CALDWELL. What is the pending point of order?

The SPEAKER. The point of order pending is the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that the motion to reconsider must have been made by a person who voted on the prevailing side.

Mr. CALDWELL. The point of order I make is that the motion of the gentleman is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, it is suggested by some Members that the calling of the roll had begun, and that one or two Members' names had been called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not correct. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the indulgence of the Chair a moment to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. This has been presented to me—the question was just submitted. I am frank to say I do not know about it, but I am going to submit it to the Speaker: What the House is now dividing on is whether you will reconsider ordering the yeas and nays. This idea has been presented to me, and it is true, that the Constitution fixes how you get the yeas and nays, it providing that one-fifth of those present under the Constitution may demand the yeas and nays; and if you have a majority of the House to decide that you will not have the yeas and nays, you are violating plainly that provision of the Constitution which requires one-fifth to order the yeas and nays.

Now, I know that the Chair wants to do right, and I want to present that thought to the Chair; and on reflection it does not look to me as though we had the right to take this vote, because in that way a majority of the House can absolutely frustrate the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The majority can not deprive the one-fifth of their constitutional right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that the House has a right to reconsider the motion for the yeas and nays, but if it does so of course immediately the motion is pending, and one-fifth of the House could order the yeas and nays again, so that it seems to the Chair that the question is one of propriety and of usefulness rather than of parliamentary law. The Chair thinks that the motion to reconsider is in order.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PHELAN. If that is correct, suppose the House orders the yeas and nays by one-fifth of the Members standing, and suppose a majority reconsider that. Then suppose, as suggested by the Chair, that the one-fifth again order the yeas and nays. Then suppose again by a majority vote the House reconsiders that motion. Can the Chair tell me what the end of the whole proposition would be?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the second motion to reconsider would be a dilatory motion. But the Chair does not see why it is not now in order to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered. It might happen that on reflection the whole House might want to do away with the ordering of the yeas and nays and ought to have an opportunity to do it.

Mr. PHELAN. A parliamentary inquiry. Suppose the House now reconsiders the ordering of the yeas and nays. Will anything be permitted to intervene before somebody has the right again to ask for the yeas and nays in the same manner?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. PHELAN. Then the first thing in order after reconsideration will be another demand for the yeas and nays. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. PHELAN. The first thing in order is the right of somebody to ask for a roll call?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not take the time of the House by repeating a question which has already been answered.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Suppose the House reconsiders the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered. That question is reconsidered. Then does the question come back whether the House will reconsider the motion by which the previous question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair has already stated that the Chair thinks that immediately the question would recur on ordering the yeas and nays, which, under the Constitution, can be ordered by one-fifth.

Mr. GARNER. All right. We have more than one-fifth, and that is enough.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. On a request for the yeas and nays one-fifth of those present rising are enough to order the yeas and nays. On the motion to reconsider if more than one-fifth rise in opposition to reconsidering, is not the motion to reconsider lost?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks these parliamentary questions will be answered by the action of the House.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand the Speaker to say that if the House decides to reconsider the motion by which the yeas and nays were ordered it will not then immediately be in order for a Member to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, if one-fifth of the House should then demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GOOD. Then I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the House shall be in order. Business will be suspended until the House is in order.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CRISP. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 198, nays 160, answered "present" 1, not voting 71, as follows:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. LEHLBACH, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3149) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 120), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WHITE of Maine: A bill (H. R. 7344) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Lewiston, Me., one German cannon or minnerwerfer, and also two 6-inch Newton trench mortar guns, or two 58.2 French trench mortar guns, or two 2.40-millimeter French trench mortar guns; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God of Hosts, King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, accept our worship and let Thy spirit descend in full measure upon us, and inspire our minds to great thoughts and our hearts to noble deeds; that we may add somewhat to the progress of the world and make for the betterment of mankind; and Thine shall be the praise, in the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BABKA, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. MAPES to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of H. R. 8708, Sixty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. HAMILL, be sworn in. He has not his certificate with him, but he was elected by over 11,000 majority, and nobody questions the election.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. HAMILL, be permitted to take the oath of office, although his certificate is not yet on file. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is no question about the gentleman's election.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No.

Mr. HAMILL appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the memorial address delivered by Mr. Lundeen, formerly a Representative from the State of Minnesota, which he delivered at Arlington on Memorial Day. It is a patriotic address of high literary merit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a memorial address delivered by Mr. Lundeen. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the call rests with the Committee on Labor.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Yesterday afternoon when we adjourned the sundry civil appropriation bill was under consideration, and the previous question had been ordered on the motion to recommit. After the previous question has been ordered upon a bill, is it not necessary to take that vote on the following day, although it be Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. It comes up on Thursday, not on Wednesday.

MINIMUM-WAGE BILL.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 5726) to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up the bill H. R. 5726, the minimum-wage bill, which is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5726.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5726, with Mr. WOOD of Indiana in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, on Wednesday last, when the committee rose, a parliamentary inquiry was submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] as to whether an amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] had been adopted. The RECORD shows that the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman from Ohio was mistaken. The vote was taken, and the amendment was agreed to, and it was announced. The RECORD shows that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FIELDS: Page 2, line 4, after the word "zone," strike out the remainder of line 4, all of lines 5 and 6 to and including the word "clerks" in line 7.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, may I offer a perfecting amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, as I stated on Wednesday last, the bill as drawn would permit the payment of a greater compensation to janitors in the post offices where janitors are employed than to many of the clerks in those offices. I do not believe that the House desires to enact legislation of that character. I believe, too, that fourth-class postmasters, postal carriers, the city delivery carriers, the rural carriers, the star carriers, and all other carriers to whom this bill as reported will not apply, are as much entitled to the consideration of this body as the employees in any other branch of the Federal Government. I take that position on the broad principle of justice to all employees and in opposition to unfair discrimination against any class of employees. In my brief time I desire to answer one argument that I know will be urged against this amendment, and that is that it would give the minimum wage as provided in the bill to fourth-class postmasters. Fourth-class postmasters are on a percentage basis. They are divided or can be divided into 10 classes, those receiving less than $100 per annum into one class, those receiving more than $100 per annum and not over $200 into another class, and so on, to the maximum compensation of $1,000 per annum. The department could and doubtless would fix a sliding scale, providing that the maximum salary should be counted for a full day's labor. Therefore, a fourth-class postmaster of grade No. 9 would work nine-tenths of a day and a postmaster of the lower grade one-tenth of a day and would be paid by the hour under this bill. Of course, the postmasters of the lower-paid offices do not devote their entire time to their duties as postmaster, but they should receive a living wage for such time as they do devote to it. This Congress that is legislating in the interest of the lower-paid employees of the country should manifest the same interest in all classes of employees and not alone in those who are organized and have representatives in Washington.

I see no reason why the postal employees of the country should not receive the same consideration that all other employees receive, and the arguments that may be urged against this amendment, that all postmasters would be given the minimum salary as provided by the bill for full time, is without foundation. It would give them the minimum salary for the number of hours actually required to perform their work.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. There is no law that classifies fourth-class postmasters into classes, and the Postmaster General would have no legal authority so to classify them. There is absolutely no classification of fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. FIELDS. But the gentleman must bear in mind that they do not work full time, and this bill provides that employees who are not employed full time shall be paid by the hour. There is a regulation that classes them into different classes. We find that one half of them receive a salary of $180 per annum and the other half receives a salary above $180 per annum——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. I therefore hope that the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] and his explanation of it is absurd, untenable, unjustifiable, and ought not to be given serious consideration. The language of the bill as it reads now makes the minimum wage apply to all except the persons holding appointments as postmasters, assistant postmasters, rural carriers, postal clerks, carriers in the City Delivery Service, and railway mail clerks. Now, the postmasters of the United States have their compensation based on the revenues of the office. If the revenues of the office reach a certain amount, the office is then second class; if it reaches a certain other amount, it is then first class; if it is below either of those amounts, it is in the third class; and up to a certain amount it is in the fourth class. Now, how do we pay fourth-class postmasters? We pay them on the basis of the cancellation of postage, not on any fixed compensation. Up to a year ago we paid them 50 per cent of the first $100 cancellation. A year ago we increased that to 80 per cent. Now the law provides for the first $100 of cancellations; after that they get a certain other percentage of all future cancellation, and they ought not to be embraced in a class that would have a fixed minimum pay. I do not remember how many fourth-class postmasters there are; something like about 40,000.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. In the opinion of the gentleman should the law be enacted and if my amendment prevails it would not apply to fourth-class postmasters at all.

Mr. MADDEN. It would apply to everybody.

Mr. FIELDS. To the postmasters who do not serve a full day, who do not devote their entire time to the duties of the office? Does the gentleman contend they would get the full benefit of the allowance under this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Why, the gentleman is repealing the law upon which the payment rests——

Mr. FIELDS. I am applying this law to the postal employees the same as the other employees, and I think it should apply.

Mr. MADDEN. Just a moment. The postal employees and railway mail clerks are classified, I think, into nine different classes. They enter the service at a fixed compensation. They are promoted every year automatically until they reach the highest grade. The clerks in the first and second class offices are promoted the same way. The city-delivery letter carriers are promoted the same way.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. The amendment of the gentleman will take them out of that classification, that it has taken the Congress years to work out.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. They are promoted when there are vacancies or openings to promote them?

Mr. MADDEN. No; they are promoted anyhow every year from one grade to another.

Mr. FIELDS. No; it does not——

Mr. MADDEN. I am stating the facts.

Mr. FIELDS. I know men who have served for years——

Mr. MADDEN. I know the gentleman does not know what he is talking about when he says that.

Mr. FIELDS. I know he does know what he is talking about.

Mr. MADDEN. Every city carrier, every clerk, every railway mail clerk, all are promoted from one grade to another every year when he qualifies. That is all there is to it. The law provides it and it must be done.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Under existing law does not a rural carrier get more than the provisions of this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. He gets $1,560 a year if he travels 24 miles.

Mr. RUCKER. This bill would not increase the salary?

Mr. MADDEN. No; and they do not want it. This provision was put in the law at the request of the postal men.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Those getting that salary would not be affected. It is those getting below $1,080 who would be affected.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the gentleman is trying to befog the issue. He is trying to muddle up the whole service. The Post Office Service is divided into classes, made so by law. What he is trying to do is to mix it up so nobody will know where it will stand, and his amendment ought not to prevail.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. BEGG. If the amendment carries, will not the small postmaster, who conducts an office in a small grocery store and probably hands out 50 pieces of mail a day, be entitled to a salary of $1,000 a year?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I do not know whether he will or not, because we do not pay him on the basis of annual compensation.

Mr. BEGG. Would we not be compelled to do so if this went through?

Mr. MADDEN. I am afraid we would. And, as a matter of fact, there are over 20,000 post offices where the compensation is not over $50 a year.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Is the gentleman willing to put the janitor of a post office on a higher salary than many of the clerks throughout the country?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman means what he says.

Mr. FIELDS. I mean exactly what I say. Does the gentleman want to pay the colored janitor of the Chicago office a greater compensation than many of the clerks in that office receive?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think this bill does that. I do not care whether the janitor is colored or white, if he is performing his duty.

Mr. FIELDS. Does the gentleman think his duty more important than that of the clerks?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not understand what he is talking about.

Mr. FIELDS. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. The amendment of the gentleman ought not to prevail. And more than that, I want to say that at the close of the last Congress a joint commission was authorized, which is now in session, consisting of five Members of the Senate and five Members of the House, to reclassify the men in the Postal Service, including postmasters, assistant postmasters, janitors, rural carriers, and everybody, and this commission is at work and will report when it has completed its labors some time this fall, and undoubtedly a new classification will be made affecting more than 350,000 people in the Postal Service. And an amendment such as is proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky would destroy the effect of the work that is now in process, and it ought not to be given serious consideration by the membership of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I do not know, but I think there are 30,000 or 40,000 fourth-class postmasters in the country.

Mr. MADDEN. About 40,000.

Mr. CANNON. The assistant postmaster or the deputy postmaster would get his little $3 a day?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no deputy postmaster in the fourth-class offices.

Mr. CANNON. But there is an assistant.

Mr. MADDEN. No; not in the fourth-class offices.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I think there is.

Mr. MADDEN. The fourth-class postmaster, if he has one, must employ him out of his own pocket.

Mr. CANNON. But the assistant is sworn in.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; he would have to be sworn in.

Mr. CANNON. Then he is an official.

Mr. MADDEN. But he is a servant of the postmaster and not recognized as an employee of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I beg pardon. He becomes an officer of the Government when he takes an oath.

Mr. MADDEN. That is in the third-class offices, but not in the fourth-class offices. There are no assistants in the fourth-class offices.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, for one I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS]. It seems, and it has long seemed to me, that one of the most outrageous performances of this Government is to maintain a post office for public service at the meager wages paid fourth-class postmasters.

Let me call the attention of the membership of this committee to this fact: Fourth-class postmasters are paid, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], a salary based on cancellation. Up to $1,000 of receipts the office is a fourth-class office. Above $1,000 of receipts it becomes a third-class office. The minute it becomes a third-class office the Government pays rent for a building, pays for fuel, and it pays at Government expense a clerk or assistant to help do the work. But before it becomes a third-class office, and while the pay would be perhaps $800 or $900, the postmaster of such office, who performs a valuable service, must out of his or her own pocket pay rent, pay for light, pay for fuel, and pay for all clerical help needed in the office. This is not fair. The fourth-class postmasters, who are as busy every hour of the day as the postmasters in third-class offices, and much busier than postmasters in second-class offices, but get $750 or $800 a year, and out of that must pay $100 or $150 for assistance, $50 or $60 for fuel, and $25 to $50 for rent, cutting the salary down to a mere pittance. Whatever clerical assistance is needed must, under existing law, be paid for by the postmaster. Let me say to you that in nearly every one of these offices clerical assistance must be had, because the people demand, and ought to demand, that the office be kept open. No postmaster can go to the office at 6 o'clock in the morning and remain in that office behind the counter in the performance of duty during the entire day.

Necessarily there are times when the postmaster must absent himself or herself from the duties of the office. In order to give service during that time they must employ some one. It will not do to say that the postmaster can engage his son or his daughter or his wife, because that merely begs the question, and says that these underpaid officers must use the service of some other member of their family offered gratuitously, without compensation, in order to perform the work of the office. I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] speaks of a commission appointed. This same question has been presented to the Congress a number of times, and for various reasons suggested—one of them a moment ago—no favorable action has been taken. It is said that somebody conducting an office in a grocery store hands out the mail and sells groceries when not waiting on the public at the post office, and therefore the compensation allowed is sufficient for the public service rendered. That may be true. But this Congress, if it wants to, ought to differentiate between those cases where a post office is maintained in a business house and those cases where it is kept in a separate house, and ought to allow some compensation to reimburse the postmaster who must maintain an office and must pay for heat, light, and rent in the performance of the duties of that office. I think it is right and fair that this amendment should be made to apply to those postmasters, and I shall gladly vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JONES of Texas offers as a substitute for Mr. FIELDS's amendment the following: Page 2, line 4, after the word "zone," strike out the remaining portion of line 4, all of lines 5 and 6, and line 7 down to and including the word "clerks."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is the same as my amendment.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is similar to the other amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. No; it is not the same amendment. It leaves out the Territory of Alaska. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] included the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. FIELDS. I stated that I had a separate amendment. I did so provide, but I have a separate amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I move, then, to strike out the last word.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, can we come to an understanding as to the time to be devoted to this amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. I desire five minutes, please.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want five minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. I suggest that we let the debate run a while.

Mr. NOLAN. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] withdraw his substitute?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; I withdraw my substitute, since it means the same thing as Mr. FIELDS's amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS]. I do not think any man can give a single really good reason why——

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; for a question. I would like to get started.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any idea as to how much this amendment would increase the amount necessary to operate the Post Office Department?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not know; but I know it will not increase the expense anything like the amount the bill will increase the expense in other lines of the Government service. Every postmaster in the United States has some discretion to exercise. He has some responsibility placed upon his shoulders. On the other hand, there are many employees included in this bill who do work that involves no discretion whatever. Why, the charwomen and the janitors and many other people included in this bill are not doing work that involves any character of discretion. I can see no reason on earth for including people of that kind and character in a minimum-wage scale and excluding people in the country who have responsibility and work of difficult character to perform. I am not making an argument against the bill, but am simply saying that if such a measure is passed the postal clerks, fourth-class postmasters, assistants, and employees should have the benefit of it.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not think that when proposing an amendment of that kind he should give us some idea of the additional tax that would be placed upon the Government by including such a proposition?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have an idea the gentleman who asks the question can not tell what other parts of this bill will cost, but I will say that is a matter of arithmetic. The rate of increase will be no greater than it will be with reference to certain other employees coming within the terms of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] says this would upset the whole scheme of pay in the Postal Department. It would not interfere with the grading of the postmasters or the clerks or anyone in that connection, because under the terms of the amendment they would simply be paid the minimum wage, regardless of the present classification; and if they would receive more under this amendment than under the ratings they now have their wages would simply be supplemented to the extent of bringing them up to $3 per day, and the others would not be affected.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman proposes by his substitute to include the carriers in the City Delivery Service and railway mail clerks?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; I understood they are to be included.

Mr. CARTER. Are those people getting as much as $1,080 now?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not know as to all of them; but if they are getting $1,080 they would not be injured by this law.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. WELLING. Does the gentleman mean to say that he is supporting a proposition here that would give every fourth-class postmaster in America a minimum wage of $3 a day?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think they are as much entitled to it as some of the others that are the beneficiaries of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I want to say this: That I do not believe it is just or fair or right to increase the compensation of janitors in every post office that employs a janitor, and to increase the wages of the charwomen, and to increase the wages of every other employee of every character and kind that works for the Government simply because they are organized and because they are being backed by an organization, and deny it to other people who are also in the employ of the Government. If one class is entitled to it, the other is also.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do; but I first want to correct an expression that I used in answer to a question awhile ago. Even if the amendment is adopted, it does not give a minimum of $3 a day to all employees. They would, in some instances, receive only 37½ cents an hour. I was in error in the statement that the $3 minimum would apply in all instances.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Suppose a fourth-class postmaster cancels 20 letters a day, on which the postage is 2 cents. That would amount to 40 cents a day, or approximately $140 a year. Would the gentleman be in favor of paying fourth-class postmasters $90 a month?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The bill provides for the rating of them. I will say this: That if they are not doing anything more than the gentleman states, they are still doing a lot more than many people do who are in the Government departments here in Washington, who stand around all day and practically do nothing and simply get in the way of people going to the departments.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I was interested in the remark that some of these postmasters would not get additional pay because they worked only part of the time. Are any fourth-class postmasters paid by the hour?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not know. The gentleman will have to ask some member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads as to that. But the ones that would be affected would be comparatively few. If you are in favor of the bill—and I take it that most of those that are fighting this motion are in favor of the bill—you are including many more who would be the beneficiaries of this bill who are doing less actual work than do the fourth-class postmasters, and doing work which involves no discretion whatever.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that fourth-class post offices are sometimes abandoned, where the service is really needed and where the people of the community are greatly inconvenienced without them, because of the fact that suitable men can not be procured at the salaries now prevailing to take the job?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. In many instances fourth-class post offices have been abandoned because postmasters could not afford to take the responsibility and do the work for the amount of pay. I get letters every few days with reference to discontinuing post offices, and I take it the other Members have the same experience.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a substitute for the pending amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLACK offers as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. FIELDS, page 2, line 4, after the word "zone" in line 4, strike out the language "nor to persons holding appointments as postmasters, assistant postmasters, rural carriers, postal clerks, carriers in the City Delivery Service, or railway mail clerks" and insert "nor to fourth-class postmasters."

Mr. BLACK. Gentlemen of the House, if you will give me your attention for about five minutes I would like to explain the effect that my amendment would have if it is adopted. Under the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS], if it is adopted, I think a fair construction of the bill would then include as amended all fourth-class postmasters and cause them to receive $1,080 per annum. I do not think the House would want to take unwise action of that sort. We have more than 40,000 fourth-class postmasters in the United States who are drawing all the way from $25 a year up to $1,000. When the compensation by the cancellation method at a fourth-class office exceeds $1,000 per annum, the office then goes to the third class and becomes a presidential office.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. FIELDS. Does the gentleman believe that the department would hold that postmasters who are paid $60 a year on any basis are devoting as much time to their duty as postmasters who receive $1,000 a year or $900 a year?

Mr. BLACK. That would not be the question involved. This bill provides that all officers of the United States Government shall be paid, if they work by the hour, 37½ cents an hour; if they work by the day, $3 a day; if they work by the month, $90 a month; if they work by the year, $1,080 a year. Therefore, if your amendment is adopted it would be bound to include fourth-class postmasters who receive their appointment from the United States. That is my construction of it, and it seems to me that there is no other reasonable interpretation that can be put upon the language.

Mr. FIELDS. They must work by the hour, because they do not work full time.

Mr. BLACK. They work by the year. They are employed annually. Of course it will be conceded that many of them do not put in their full time looking after the work of their office, for it is not required; but even with that it is quite clear to me that they would come within the meaning of the gentleman's amendment.

The point I was getting at is this: I realize as a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads that the fourth-class postmasters of the country are inadequately paid, and that a method should be, and I have no doubt will be, worked out that will materially increase their compensation according to the business done at their offices. I agree that their need for additional compensation is urgent.

You will recall that at the last session of Congress we appointed a joint commission composed of members of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and they are now working out this whole proposition; and the House will at once see that we can not take up a thing of this kind on such short notice as we have here to-day, with 40,000 fourth-class postmasters, who get all the way from $25 a year up to $1,000 a year, and increase them by a blanket provision of this kind to $1,080. If my amendment is adopted, all other postal employees will be included, and I think they ought to be included, because under the present law we now have a classification as to postal clerks and letter carriers of six grades—first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth. They begin at $1,000 a year.

Now, what will be the effect of this minimum wage bill if it is passed as to the relative salaries of Government employees? Take my own post office at Clarksville, Tex. There is a janitor in the post office there who receives $720 a year or thereabout. He is not a skilled employee at all. Under this bill he will receive $1,080 a year, or $80 more than the postal clerks when they enter the service after having stood a rigid civil-service examination.

Mr. FIELDS. He will receive that whether my amendment is adopted or not.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; that is true. Now, another thing. If the Good amendment is defeated—and an effort is going to be made to defeat it on a roll call; we have had propaganda through the mails asking for its defeat—what will be the effect? If the Good amendment is defeated, the janitor in a post office will receive $1,320, which will be more than the average postal clerk and letter carrier receives. I do not wish to be understood as throwing the slightest slur at the work of a janitor. Any honorable work is honorable to perform, but certainly no one ought to contend that unskilled work of this kind should be paid for at a larger scale of compensation than such skilled employees as postal clerks, letter carriers, railway-mail clerks, and employees of that kind. I am going to prevent such a situation if I can. I hope my substitute will be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Labor Committee of the House held hearings on this bill during the months of March, April, May, and June, at which hearings full opportunity was given to all the affected classes to appear and give their side of the controversy. I am informed by the ranking member of that committee [Mr. NOLAN], than whom labor has no better friend on the floor of this House, that the bill as it stands is acceptable to all classes of postal employees, and that being the case we should hesitate before tacking on any amendment. The provision exempting postal employees was inserted by my friend, Mr. MADDEN, who has always advocated the best possible working and wage conditions for postal employees, on the ground that city carriers, clerks, and railway mail clerks are classified into grades which entitle them to annual promotions and operates automatically, while in the case of rural carriers the annual salary for service on a standard route of 24 miles is $1,560, with extra compensation for each additional mile, so they would under no circumstances come under the provisions of this act. And as the salaries of all postmasters and assistant postmasters are based on receipts of the office they serve, it will be seen that this could not affect them. Then, too, as the Joint Commission to Investigate Postal Salaries, including not only postmasters of every grade but clerks, carriers, railway mail clerks, rural delivery carriers, janitors, and laborers, is now at work, and will undoubtedly report a comprehensive revision of all salaries before the next session, it would seem unwise at this time to amend this bill, which in itself makes no pretense of dealing with any of the activities of the Postal Service.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. VAILE. I wish the gentleman would clear up some doubt which some of us have. Can the gentleman tell us whether the persons mentioned in lines 4 to 7, on page 2, postmasters, assistant postmasters, rural carriers, postal clerks, carriers in the City Delivery Service, and railway mail clerks, any of them, receive now under the classification less than the amount specified in this bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. I think not, but as to that I am unable to say definitely.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; I have only five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That carries clerks in the service at $900.

Mr. KNUTSON. Be that as it may, they receive a bonus or temporary increase provided for in the law of 1918 and continued in the law of 1919. The fact remains that the postal organizations appearing before the committee stated that the bill was acceptable to them.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I can not yield, although I would like to yield to my friend from Missouri. We all want labor to receive every penny to which it is entitled, but we can not get away from the fact that after the extensive hearings which have been held on the bill we can not amend the bill on the floor of the House properly without having hearings before us, especially when we are absolutely ignorant of conditions. Why not stand by the committee which has held hearings for several months and pass the bill without materially changing it? So far as I am concerned I am also going to vote against the Good amendment which was adopted by the Committee of the Whole House last Wednesday. [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can not get some limit of time on this amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman propose to close debate on all amendments?

Mr. NOLAN. No; on the amendment and substitute of the postal appropriation.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman means the postal substitute?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It does not deny the right to offer other amendments and to discuss them?

Mr. NOLAN. No; only the postal amendment.

Mr. FIELDS. That applies to the amendment before the House and amendments thereto?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. If this amendment does not carry, I have another amendment that contains a part of it, which I desire to offer after a vote is had on this.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment and substitute be closed in 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and substitute close in 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That will not cut off debate on other amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. On the amendment now pending and the substitute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to present another amendment at this time, if proper. After the word "clerks," line 7, insert "and said post-office employees receiving $2,500 or less per annum shall be entitled to the bonus of $20 per month allowed to all civil-service employees of the Government."

Mr. Chairman, I am going to take the time allowed to me to say a word for the clerks and letter carriers in post offices who will be put in the position of receiving $300 less than the employees in the unskilled positions in Washington and other sections of the country if this bill passes, and I hope it will. Surely there is no Member of the House who has the welfare of the Post Office at heart—and the welfare of the Post Office Department includes the sociological and humanitarian side as well as its business side—who is willing that a large number of the clerks and carriers, upon whom the efficiency of that department rests, shall be paid a smaller salary than is given to the commonest laborer in the public service of this country. If there is one charge that the business men of America make now against the business of the country, it is against the efficiency of the Post Office Department. How in the name of common sense are we to expect efficiency in that department, which affects the business life of this country more than any other department, if this Congress permits these men to be underpaid? Thep are underpaid. Every day we read in the newspapers a statement, which can not be contradicted, because the figures are official, and they run throughout the civilized world, that the cost of living has increased over 100 per cent in five years. That means that men in the Post Office Department are getting for $1 what they paid 50 cents for a few years ago. Under these conditions, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think the time has come when we ought to express our opinion in practical language as to what we think of the pay being given these men.

The laborer gets $1,080 a year, $90 a month, by this bill, and he gets his $240 bonus—$1,320 in all—while thousands of post-office clerks and carriers get but $1,000, $1,200, and $1,300 a year. The post-office clerks, men and women, must be efficient; they must have a good brain and plenty of patience; they are more than ordinarily intelligent; they work under the worst possible conditions in some of the post offices—in cellars in the great big post office in Boston, for our post office is a disgrace and a detriment to the health of the men and women working there.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that all of the representatives of the different postal organizations are in favor of this bill as written?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, that may be so, but I attended the convention of the Massachusetts post-office clerks in Worcester about six weeks ago, and they agreed on a maximum of $2,000 a year for clerks and carriers, and I agreed with them and assured them that I would say so to the House the first chance I had.

Mr. NOLAN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that they are now endeavoring to get a commission appointed to investigate the Postal Service to recommend legislation, and have bills drafted, and want their force taken care of by the Post Office Committees of the House and the Senate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be true, and I would say, if the gentleman makes that statement, he knows what he is talking about, but at the same time I can see no harm in taking care of those getting $1,320 or less, if it can be done in this bill. Personally I do not believe in waiting one hour. Costs are increasing every day, though the war has been over eight months. The month of June shows a 4 per cent increase over the month of May. From my own investigation, the United States Government does not pay large numbers of its employees adequately. This results in thousands of cases where whole families are underfed and inadequately clothed, and such a condition is a disgrace to this Government. [Applause.]

What I have said about post-office employees is largely true of customhouse employees, many of whom have not received increase in pay at all proportionate to the increased cost of living. If the rules permitted, I would fight here all day that the men and women in these important branches of the public service get the pay they richly deserve.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I think much of the debate in respect to the amendments before the House and the substitutes is proceeding under a wrong conception of the objects and purposes of this bill. As a member of the committee that favorably reported the present bill, I wish to say that the statement made this morning by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is correct, and should have some weight with this House. The gentleman from Illinois is a member of the Post Office Committee, and the post-office clerks and Federal employees have no better friend in this House than the gentleman from Illinois, and no interest of theirs is going to suffer at his hands. I will say further that the committee that reported this bill gave due consideration to this matter. I can not understand how men can get up here in this House, who have not investigated or studied this bill, and proclaim themselves as friends of the post-office employees and fourth-class postmasters, who ask that they be not put under this amendment, but that they be given their rights under the Post Office Committees.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the gentleman to state that the postal employees have asked that they be not included in this bill. I would like to know by what authority the gentleman makes that statement. I am a member of the Post Office Committee, and I have never heard of any organization of postal employees protesting against being included in this bill.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman [Mr. HERSEY] will yield to me, I will state that the president of the National Association of Letter Carriers, the secretary of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, and the officers of the railway mail clerks' organizations have approved this bill, and they want to be taken care of when it comes to legislation affecting their interests by the committee of this House that has always looked after their interests, and that is the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further. I have the floor. It is absurd for any Member of this House to stand up here and plead for fourth-class postmasters, of which we have some 40,000 in this Nation, who are getting less, many of them, than $100 a year, and endeavor to raise their wages up to $1,080 a year when they are not earning more than $80 or $100 and do not expect any more. It is absurd to come in here and claim that you should not raise the wage of janitors and the charwomen, because they are employed only in the first-class and second-class post offices. A fourth-class postmaster does not employ at the expense of the Government a janitor or charwoman, unless it is for his own benefit.

Mr. RUCKER. The fourth-class postmaster has to do all of the drudgery himself.

Mr. HERSEY. He has to do all of the drudgery himself, and if he does not get money enough, even if it is not more than $50 a year, he does not have to stand it; he can resign. It would be some surprise to a fourth-class postmaster who is getting $50 a year to find that his wages by this amendment had been raised to $1,080 without even his request. The time has come when this Congress must cease to spend the money of the taxpayers by such wild and reckless expenditures, and I trust this amendment will fail, and that the bill will pass without amendment.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman if the adoption of this minimum wage bill as proposed under these amendments would prevent the remedial legislation which is contemplated for the relief of these postal clerks and fourth-class postmasters?

Mr. HERSEY. The adoption of this bill without amendments would assist and aid all remedial legislation. We can not legislate to settle all labor problems in this country by this one bill for a minimum wage. The gentleman ought to remember that this is a minimum wage bill, and it does not fix the wages of men getting any more than $1,080 a year.

Mr. LANHAM. The adoption of this amendment does not stand as a stumblingblock in the way of the remedial legislation contemplated?

Mr. HERSEY. Not at all. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] talks about men getting $2,500 a year, and how they ought to have more. This bill does not affect those men getting more than $1,080 a year.

Mr. FIELDS. And neither does the amendment.

Mr. HERSEY. Yes; it does. The gentleman's amendment would defeat the bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention of the committee very briefly to what we are doing here. I do not believe there is a single member of this committee who knows what any of these amendments offered will do in dollars and cents. I do not believe that this Congress, made up of professional men, of business men, men whose duty it is to look after the doing of business in a businesslike way, can afford to vote for these amendments. Now, I expect I have as many fourth-class postmasters in my district, because it is a rural district, as any man in this House. I know that most of those postmasters are very much underpaid. Something should be done for them. But I also know that many of these postmasters take the office not because they want the salary so much, but because they want the offices in their places of business.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I only have a few moments; I can not yield. They only devote a small part of their time to the post office. The cases are rare when you have any trouble getting people to take the offices. Usually there is a controversy in every little town of from 7 to 8 or 10 or 15 stores about who gets the post office, because they want it in their place of business to draw trade.

Mr. LAYTON. Absolutely.

Mr. SISSON. As a matter of fact, they are paid very little money, and in most instances paid too little. I am willing to help them, but I want to help them in a businesslike way. Will some gentleman tell me whether these amendments offered will cost $10,000,000, $15,000,000, $24,000,000, or $32,000,000? If it is an average of $800 increase, it will be over $32,000,000 added by this bill if the amendment is adopted.

If it is an increase to the fourth-class postmasters of $600, then it is $24,000,000. If we adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD], we will have added ten or fifteen more millions. I do not believe that the amendments offered in this minimum wage bill, brought out as a whole, ought to be tacked on without consideration, without knowing where you are going and what it will cost. Will gentlemen vote to add $50,000,000 to the expenses of the Government blindly? No man can tell what it will cost. I am in favor of legislating in the proper way. Let the Post Office Committee report a bill and give the House and country some information to act upon. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, having this matter under consideration, were themselves unwilling to determine this matter without thoroughly investigating it. They did not have the time to go into it during the regular session, and therefore a joint commission was appointed between the two Houses for the purpose of investigating this very difficult and mooted question as to how you should pay fourth-class postmasters so as to deal with them properly. Therefore I think these amendments ought to be voted down. And, gentlemen, let me ask you this: Do not you believe some one ought to be in this House to represent the American people and the taxpayers? I hear a great deal here about the people drawing the money.

I have not heard one single word during all of this debate about the people who are to pay the bill [applause], the people whom you and I represent, the people we are sent here to represent and whose best interests we are here to represent. I have not heard one word, but only about people who are being paid. Nothing about people who pay. I will admit that fourth-class postmasters in many cases are very much underpaid.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It seems to me, if I understood these amendments correctly, that these fourth-class postmasters, instead of it being in their interest it will result in a very large number being abolished entirely, because they can send——

Mr. SISSON. I fear the Post Office Department may be compelled to kill most of the small country offices, for you must understand the Post Office Department has an appropriation bill that appropriates a certain amount of money; and if you pass this bill with the amendment, and it passes the Senate, which I doubt, good administration on the part of the Post Office Department would compel the closing up of about two-thirds of the fourth-class offices.

Mr. RUCKER. The Post Office Department could not do anything much more unpopular than it has been doing.

Mr. SISSON. I do not believe the gentleman's assault upon the Post Office Department as being unpopular——

Mr. RUCKER. I am making no assault.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; it is as much of an assault as the gentleman can make to say "the Post Office Department could not do anything more unpopular than it has been doing." I agree with my friend from Missouri that fourth-class postmasters are underpaid, but I do not believe this is the right way to adjust the pay.

I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] that we ought to give this matter proper consideration in a proper way and give to each fourth-class post office the amount of pay to which the office is entitled. This method of offering amendments to the bills on the floor without any gentleman knowing how many millions of dollars it will cost is unwarranted, unwise, and is the worst method of legislation. Not a single Member of Congress who has been offering these amendments has the remotest idea as to whether they will cost five million or fifty million.

I also believe that the Good amendment ought to be adopted, so that the laborers provided for in this bill should not receive the $240 bonus. For example, the bill provides that no laborer employed by the year in any branch of the Federal Government shall receive less than $1,080. Now, take a janitor in the Post Office Department. His minimum base pay would be $1,080. He then would get the $240 bonus, making $1,320. The majority of the third-class postmasters get in the neighborhood of $1,200, so you would have the anomalous situation of the janitor in the post office getting $1,320 and the postmaster getting only $1,200. In the second-class offices the assistant postmaster gets about $1,100 or $1,200. In many instances under this provision the janitor would receive $1,320.

In my judgment this whole bill is wrong in principle. I do not believe that minimum salaries ought to be arbitrarily fixed. The contention here is that "every man is entitled to a living wage." This is an unsound principle. No man is entitled to a living wage as a matter of right. The first difficulty that confronts you is what is a living wage? One man will live well and save money on a small salary. Another man will live shabbily and be constantly in debt on a large salary. The true principle is every man should be entitled to all that he earns when he is working for himself. If working for another, he is entitled to all that he and his employer can agree upon. I do believe that "every laborer is worthy of his hire." But this takes into consideration the principle of a man's efficiency and his productive capacity. In the performance of physical labor a weak and puny man can not earn as much as a strong man physically and is not entitled to the same wage. A slovenly, inefficient, lazy laborer is not entitled to as much as a thrifty, intelligent, efficient, and energetic laborer. No society can last long and no nation continue its business long that does not recognize this principle.

I voted against this bill when it was up before, and I shall vote against it now in its present form. I do not believe that the taxpayers of America should be called upon to respond in such enormous amounts so that the Government will be able to pay salaries far in excess of what men can get in private employ. In towns of from two to three and five and even ten thousand people the efficient clerks get from $50 to $75 and $100 a month. The Government employee works, or pretends to work, most of them, about seven hours, and under this bill the lowest wage paid to the most ignorant, half-witted janitor is $1,320.

Where will this sort of legislation end? Will it be when the Government is completely bankrupt, or will the people, before we reach that horrible financial state, wake up at home, use their ballots properly, and send men to Congress who will give some attention to the taxpayers? In the early days of the Republic Congressmen and Senators took pride in the fact that they were representatives of the people in their districts, and that they were not the special representatives of those people who absorb and enjoy all the taxes paid by the people.

We have been for many hours discussing this bill, and I have not heard a single Representative mention the interests of the taxpayers or mention the interests of the people they are representing. If you were up in the gallery, a stranger to this Government, you would imagine that this House of Representatives was a body organized for the purpose of taking care of the employees of the Government, and that the whole Government itself was an organization the purpose, chief aim, and object of which was to take care of the employees of the Government, and that the only function in all the different branches was to furnish employment for those who were fortunate enough to be on its rolls.

You never hear anything about the taxpayers. You never hear anything about the good of the people. You never hear anything about the interest of the great agricultural class of people, but the cry is continuously for the downtrodden Federal employees. A few people well organized, having filled our mails with propaganda, have at last become the masters of Congress, and the people we represent are being lost sight of, and we are becoming more afraid of the small minority than we are of the great majority of the people whom we really ought to represent.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore do not believe that this bill should pass, and I certainly do not believe that this bill should pass if these amendments are added to the bill, because that makes it infinitely worse. I do not believe that this is a good way to legislate, and I believe that this bill and all these amendments ought to be voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield. [Laughter and applause.] Gentlemen, I want to assert without fear of contradiction that there are three classes of Government employees who have not been heard by the Committee on Labor in the preparation of this bill. One is the fourth-class postmasters, another the third-class postmasters, and another the clerks who help do the work in those offices. They have not been heard either in person or by any organization representing them. Now, the gentleman from Indiana who speaks about a fourth-class postmaster canceling only twenty 2-cent stamps a day should listen to this from a fourth-class postmaster of the country:

LUEDERS, TEX., July 7, 1919.

Judge THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I would like to have your judgment on a question. Do you think there is any likelihood of the postmasters of the fourth class getting any better pay? I know we get a little raise beginning the first of this month, but it does not amount to anything if you will take the time to figure it out. I can't stay at the price and live. My office is getting where I have to have help. I have to pay $50 per month for help, and I get what is left, which amounted to $39 for the last quarter.

Mr. LAYTON. What is his business?

Mr. BLANTON. He is a fourth-class postmaster——

Mr. LAYTON. What else does he do?

Mr. BLANTON. Let me finish his letter, and you will see.

Can you blame me for quitting? If I did not make a little on the outside—

[Laughter.]

I would starve to death. I have no one to take care of or I would done been dead as heck. My rural carrier gets $1,548 a year and works three and a half hours a day. I get about $800 a year, pay $600 of it for help, work from 5.30 a. m. to 7 p. m. Now, Judge, I am not blowing off—you know I am not that kind of a man, but telling you the straight truth, and you know if my word is worth anything or not.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain your friend.

DAVID J. OLINGER, P. M.

The above is a fair sample of the letters I am daily receiving from fourth-class postmasters, many of whom have lately given up their positions in disgust, and in instances it has been impossible, as at Norton, Tex., to find anyone to take the office.

As I said the other day, I want the country to know that this minimum-wage bill, which sought to give $110 per month—counting bonus—to negro porters, janitors, messengers, watchmen, and charwomen, 18 years of age and up, and which absolutely refuses to do justice to third and fourth class postmasters and postal clerks, was fathered and brought into this House by a Republican [Mr. NOLAN], was reported out by a Republican committee, and is being handled and so passed on the floor of this House by a Republican majority. I want these postmasters and postal clerks to know that the Republicans of this House are Job's comforters to them, and have fought against and voted down every provision and amendment seeking to do them justice. The old excuse of letting the matter be cared for by the Post Office Committee is threadbare and ridiculous and will not be longer swallowed by these deserving Government employees.

I am intimately acquainted with Mr. Olinger and have known him for over 20 years. He is a capable, highly deserving man, works in his post office from early morning till late at night, in Lueders, a thriving railroad town in Jones County, on the edge of the great oil-producing section of the world-renowned Ranger oil field; yet after deducting the $50 per month he is required to pay his clerk, he receives only $200 a year, just a little over $16 per month. And while refusing to grant him any relief, this Republican House is going to pay $110 per month to negro janitors and chargirls 18 years old, and at the same time let them enjoy each year one month's vacation on full pay and 30 days additional on doctor's certificate on full pay. You are going to hear from the people.

Now, I want to read you one from a third-class postmaster.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am very sorry I can not, my time is so limited.

This letter is dated Albany, Tex., June 24, 1919, and is addressed to the First Assistant Postmaster General, and says:

This office is swamped with work owing to oil developments in this territory. We are unable to work from 15 to 25 sacks of "Albany distributing" mail, which arrives about 6.45 a. m., until after departure of star routes, which delays this mail 24 hours. The service at Breckenridge has collapsed to such an extent that business firms at that place have parcel post and C. O. D. mail come to this office and send here 27 miles for it. I delivered recently for one firm in Breckenridge C. O. D. packages to the amount of $1,225.24 in one day. I can not work mail for all of Throckmorton County, handle parcel post for Stephens County, and be central accounting office for Shackelford County, and give the patrons of this office service with only $41 per month clerk hire. The receipts of this office so far this quarter amount to $2,036.41. Sales of stamped paper, $1,923.91; box rents, $112.50; total receipts for this quarter last year, $1,331.30. * * * Why are not the patrons of this office entitled to service as well as the patrons of first and second class offices?

Let me read you another excerpt.

Mr. SNYDER. Is that from a fourth-class postmaster?

Mr. BLANTON. From a third-class postmaster. He says:

Why, the rural carrier and his substitute are paid $1,665 per annum for four hours' work, six days a week, serving 84 boxes, while this office is allowed only $492 per annum clerk hire to serve 3,000 patrons of this office, separate mail for 7,000 in Throckmorton County, and be central accounting office for Shackelford County. Why, a clerk in this office has to work 13 hours a day, 6 days a week, and 8 hours on Sunday for $41 per month, while in Abilene they get $125 per month for 8 hours per day and 50 cents per hour for overtime.

Now, gentlemen, this is the situation: This highly intelligent, educated, capable, diligent, overworked postmaster, Mr. Frank K. Sterrett, does not make $110 per month, and never gets a vacation. Here we are asking the clerks in the rural offices—clerks, if you please, who have no other business, who do not get anything else on the outside—to work for $41 per month; white men and white women, if you please; and yet you Republicans with your Republican majority are going to give negro janitors and negro charwomen, 18 years of age, $110 per month, with a whole month vacation each year on full pay. The people of this country are going to call you to account, and you will be absolutely unable to justify yourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts also asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I would not ordinarily intrude upon the time of the committee except for the fact that in my younger days I spent four years as a clerk in a post office. And I think I know pretty well the exactions and duties that fall upon them. There is no more important work in this Government than that done by the Post Office Department. It is the carrier of messages of joy and sorrow, of business and prosperity, to the people of this land.

I do not know whether anyone represented these people or not. I do not care. I want to say to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] that I am strongly in favor of his bill. I am in favor of any bill that fixes a minimum wage for every man and woman that works in America, and I care not who they are. But I do not believe we ought to exempt a large class such as this.

Here is the difficulty. You have added to the post-office work the parcel post. You have added the war savings stamps, you have added a multitude of duties to the average duty of a postmaster, and all over my district and all over the district of every man in this House there are fourth-class postmasters, rural carriers, third-class postmasters, second-class postmasters, post-office clerks, and so on, that are barely eking out an existence and in some instances compelled to follow other avocations in order to live. If they are officers of this Government the Government ought to pay them enough to justify them in attending to their duties, which are numerous, manifold, and important. And for that reason it would be a great mistake to leave out of this bill this class of employees.

With reference to railway mail clerks, there is no occupation in America more hazardous. Every mail clerk that goes out on a run takes his life in his hands, like the soldier who goes on the firing line. The rural carriers go in windy weather, rain and storm. They go to the houses of the farmers of this land. And my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] says we do not hear from the people who are paying the bills. The people that are paying the bills want the men who are doing the work for them to be adequately compensated, so that they can live and that their families can live decently.

I am in favor of this bill. I want it extended to every character of Government agency, and I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will be adopted and this character of employees will be included in the benefits of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended one minute.

Mr. BEE. I do not care to consume any more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] is recognized.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man in this House in my interest for the postal employees of all classes, for I spent 15 years of my life in different branches of the Postal Service. But let me tell you how foolish a thing you are trying to do when you attempt to apply this bill to fourth-class postmasters.

On the 1st day of January, 1919, there were 42,704 fourth-class post offices in the United States, and of that number practically 50 per cent received a salary of less than $180 per year, or, say, 20,000 postmasters received less than $180 a year, and that $180 represented the total revenue of the Government at those post offices. Now, an attempt to apply this bill would result in closing those post offices.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman understands that my substitute amendment would except the fourth-class postmasters from the provisions of the bill and include all the classified employees?

Mr. RANDALL of California. I am speaking to the original amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. And while I would be glad to see the postmasters' condition improved, the effect of the amendment as applied to the fourth-class post offices would be to close them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill is the emanation of six years' work along this line. It was introduced here in 1913 by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] after he had given it much thought and after it had run the gantlet of all labor organizations and of all those who were not in labor organizations that could be reached personally and by representation. It has run the gantlet of all the opposition, and finally it appears before us in its present form. The bill itself is what is wanted by the employees generally. The exceptions made in the bill were agreed to by those who are interested in it by their own choosing.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. No; I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

It is high time that something of this kind be passed. Now is the time of all times that something should be done. We have gone through a war, and already we are talking of rearrangement. Some of the employers of labor have attempted a rearrangement, and they point to the Government employees as a reason why they should rearrange wages outside. Let me tell you that always in the arguments between employers and employees the wages of the employees in the Government service are pitted against the wages of the employees on the outside.

Now, let us not have an example of low wages paid to the Government employees to be pointed at. When these soldiers and sailors that we are talking so much about have learned trades and want to go to work at their trades, those who are returning and going into all kinds of avocations, let us not have an example here of low wages to be pointed at by their future employers. We do not want to reduce wages. We want to keep up the standard of wages in this country, and this minimum wage is the plan for doing it. Let us have a minimum wage of $3 a day, and that minimum will be respected everywhere outside by manufacturers and workmen.

I believe we should pass this bill. I am opposed to any amendment, whether it is the Good amendment or any other amendment that is offered. I am for the bill just as it is now, and this Congress can then go to the country and say to the people, "Here is the lowest minimum wage. Bring the cost of living down as low as you will, but this is the minimum of wages that we will stand for."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not disagree with any statement that has been made about the wages of postal employees. We did not make any investigation of the salaries or income of third or fourth class postmasters. We made no investigation of the wages of railway mail clerks or city-delivery carriers or the clerks in the post offices. But we did have before our committee on numerous occasions the representatives of those organizations indorsing the principle of this bill. We did not have the representatives of the fourth-class postmasters or of the third-class postmasters before us, but they were free to come before our committee, because open hearings have been repeatedly held on this bill or on a similar bill since 1913.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NOLAN. I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will be fair.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman would not yield to anybody else, and for that reason I can not yield to him. We gave an opportunity to be heard to everyone in this country who wanted to be heard on this bill. Everybody that came before us was in favor of the bill. The representatives of the postal employees were in favor of it, and they realized that it was not to apply to their members. They feel that their wants and needs can properly be cared for by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Now, a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] is offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. He has had an ample opportunity during the time he has been a Member of Congress to look after the interests of the postal employees, and I do not know but that he has consistently done so. But I know this, that the gentleman from Texas was one of 16 men in the last Congress who voted against this minimum wage bill on a roll call, and I do not think that the friends of this bill can expect it to be amended by the opponents of the principle.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman said the postal employees indorsed the principle of the $3-a-day minimum wage?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Did they know that they were to be excluded from the operations of the bill?

Mr. NOLAN. Absolutely; and they wanted to be cared for by the committees that have always considered their legislation—the Committees on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House and Senate, who have a joint commission at present working, or supposed to be working, and who are expected to recommend legislation regarding the wages and conditions of postal employees.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, their approval of this bill or their failure to want to be included in it was because they expected to be included in another bill?

Mr. NOLAN. The reason why they are excepted from this bill is because their exemption was advocated almost unanimously by the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The gentleman from Mississippi is right. You can not legislate generally on a condition of this kind where no consideration has been given to it. But the needs and the wants of postal employees are to be left to the committee of this House that is appointed for that purpose.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman not know that all the raise this bill will effect as to classified employees will be $80 per annum, their entrance grade now being $1,000?

Mr. NOLAN. I understand the point that the gentleman makes, but in answer to that I will say this, that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads can take care of that situation immediately, and if they want to make it $80 in addition to the $1,000 which they now receive, or $180, after hearings and consideration, they can make that the entrance salary and let it affect the postal employees. They can also give some consideration to the needs and wants of third and fourth class postmasters, and they can find out all the angles attached to that rather complicated condition.

Mr. BLACK. One more short question.

Mr. NOLAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think that any investigation is needed to determine whether or not the classified postal clerks ought to receive as much salary as a janitor? [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. I do not; but you do not confine it entirely to that.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. Is the gentleman advised that postal clerks and carriers in the City Delivery Service and railway mail clerks are expected to be taken care of by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

Mr. NOLAN. I understand that legislation will be introduced in the immediate future to take care of all the employees in the Postal Service.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. Do not the railway mail clerks get more than $3 a day now?

Mr. NOLAN. They do. The minimum amount for postal employees is 2½ cents an hour above the minimum provided in this bill, which is a minimum of 37½ cents. The postal employees receive a minimum of 40 cents an hour, and the minimum amount provided in this bill is 37½ cents.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, it has been contended that the fourth-class postmasters are not entitled to as much as $90 a month, or $1,080 per annum, and some good reasons have been furnished for that contention. But the fourth-class postmasters in a great many instances—I think I might be safe in saying in a large majority of cases—are certainly entitled to more compensation than they are receiving to-day, and they are entitled to consideration at the hands of this committee and of this Congress. [Applause.]

Now, the gentlemen who were in the Sixty-fifth Congress will remember that we had a bill brought in from the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads providing increase of pay of postal employees. The history of that legislation is a little bit interesting to the country Congressman and his constituents. We all remember that this bill for the increase in the salaries provided for an increase of about 20 to 30 per cent to every employee in the big cities of this country, and yet it provided for an increased salary for only one class of postal employees in the country outside of the cities. Those were the rural carriers, and their increase amounted to only 15 per cent. I do not know what influence came over the members of our Post Office Committee of the Sixty-fifth Congress, because most of them, as I recall, represented country districts, unless the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who hails from the city of Chicago, so completely overpowered and hypnotized them as to make them ignore the rights of their own constituents. He is one of the strongest men in this House, and by his personality and magnetism he seems to have been able to enforce his convictions upon the entire Post Office Committee to the benefit of the service in the cities but to the detriment of the service in the country.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman wants to be fair. Now, will he tell the House in what way we enacted legislation to the detriment of the country service?

Mr. CARTER. I have just stated that. You proposed an increase of 20 to 30 per cent for all the city employees and proposed only one increase for the country employees, and that was an increase of 15 per cent to the rural carriers, and in that bill you did absolutely nothing for the fourth-class postmasters. In that bill you did absolutely nothing for the clerks in the third-class post offices.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. In the first place, the gentleman is not stating the fact.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, well, I do not think the gentleman intends to say that.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman intends to misstate the fact.

Mr. CARTER. I have the gentleman's bill and the other bill right before me. We will see whether I am stating the fact or not.

Mr. MADDEN. The fourth-class postmasters had their compensation increased from 50 per cent of the cancellations to 100 per cent of the cancellations.

Mr. CARTER. Up to $50.

Mr. MADDEN. Up to $100.

Mr. CARTER. Up to the first $100—up to $50, as proposed in the gentleman's bill, but the Committee of the Whole raised it to $100.

Mr. MADDEN. No; we provided for $100 in the recommendation of the Post Office Committee. Now, the third-class post masters' clerks were provided with an increase of 50 per cent.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; an increase of 50 per cent was provided in an amendment proposed on the floor of the House and adopted by the Committee of the Whole, but the bill as it came into this House did not provide one cent of increase for them.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, it did.

Mr. CARTER. I have the bill right here, and it does not provide any increase.

Mr. MADDEN. A 50 per cent increase was provided in the committee.

Mr. CARTER. I have the bill here. I should like to have the gentleman show me just where that comes in.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not tell where it comes in without the bill before me, but I know this——

Mr. CARTER. I can show the gentleman where it comes in in the bill passed by the House, but the gentleman can not find it in the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. RANDALL of California. That matter was discussed in the Post Office Committee and adopted in the committee.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman is mistaken about that. I proposed the amendment myself.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman will admit that clerks in the third-class post offices were increased 50 per cent.

Mr. CARTER. They were increased by an amendment proposed on the floor of the House, but as the bill was reported by the committee it did not make that increase.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, it did.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. BLACK. I ask unanimous consent that that substitute be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. FIELDS: Page 2, line 4, after the word "zone," strike out the language "nor to persons holding appointments as postmasters, assistant postmasters, rural carriers, postal clerks, carriers in the City Delivery Service, or railway mail clerks" and insert "nor to fourth-class postmasters."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 2, noes 107.

Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have that amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FIELDS: Page 2, line 4, after the word "zone," strike out the remainder of line 4 and all of lines 5 and 6 and to and including the word "clerks" in line 7.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FIELDS) there were—ayes 31, noes 131.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FIELDS: Page 2, line 5, after the word "postmasters" strike out the remainder of line 5, all of line 6, and to and including the word "clerks" in line 7.

Mr. MADDEN. A point of order. That has already been voted on.

Mr. FIELDS. No; it has not.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order.

Mr. FIELDS. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the word "postmasters" occurs twice in the line. Which does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. FIELDS. After the words "assistant postmasters" I desire to strike out the remainder.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. The point of order is that the substance of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky has already been defeated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; not the whole of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; all of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. FIELDS. No; Mr. Chairman——

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can not have some limit of time for debate on this amendment.

Mr. FIELDS. I do not want to agree to that just now.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman can have his time. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Make it 15.

Mr. NOLAN. Very well, I will make it 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be limited to 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment leaves in the bill the language which applies to "postmasters and assistant postmasters." It removes the difficulties that were referred to by those speaking in opposition to my former amendment. This amendment puts this proposition before you squarely: Are you willing to pay the messengers and the janitors in the Post Office Department and in the offices throughout the country in which messengers or janitors are employed, and the Federal employees in all other branches of the Federal Government, a wage of $3 per day and exclude the postal clerks, city-delivery clerks, the rural carriers, and the railroad postal clerks? That is the proposition exactly. In other words, my amendment puts the city clerks, the rural carriers, the star carriers, and the city-delivery carriers on the same basis, gives them the same benefits under this law that are given to all other Federal employees.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. VAILE. Can the gentleman state how many postal clerks, carriers in the City Delivery Service, or railway mail clerks there are receiving less than 37½ cents per hour, or if employed by the month less than $90 per month, or if employed by the year $1,080?

Mr. FIELDS. I will answer the gentleman by asking him a question. Can he state how many men in other branches of the Federal Government will be benefited by the bill as it now stands?

Mr. VAILE. No.

Mr. FIELDS. I am acting on the general principle of justice to all employees.

Mr. VAILE. The gentleman is offering an amendment that will apparently not affect these people at all.

Mr. FIELDS. Then why oppose the amendment?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. All the railway mail clerks enter the service at $1,100 and they would not be affected at all. All postal clerks and letter carriers enter at $1,000, and therefore for the first year they would receive the benefit of the increase, and I should say offhand, from the knowledge I have, that there are 15,000 or 16,000 of these men who would be affected.

Mr. VAILE. Under this arrangement the first-year men would get more than the second-year men?

Mr. BLACK. No; the first-year men would be raised to $1,080.

Mr. VAILE. They would get $80 more.

Mr. BLACK. No; they would receive $20 less.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, as I have previously stated, under this bill as drawn the janitors in all post offices where janitors are employed will get the benefit of this bill, but there will be many clerks in these offices that will not receive the benefit of it, and who will, if the bill is enacted as it stands, receive less money than the janitors receive. I do not believe the membership of this House wants to go on record as indorsing that kind of legislation. I for one am unwilling to do so.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested and edified by the learned, patriotic address of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] a few minutes ago. In his excessive modesty he warned the House that perhaps we do not know what we are doing. I have heard that same kind of talk for a long time, and I want to say right now, that while I have profound respect for every Member of the House, on both sides of the aisle, I believe that there is sometimes and on some occasions more hypocrisy practiced among Members of Congress than in any other body containing a like number of men.

Do you tell me that it is your judgment that these bucks down here in the corridors of public buildings, that crowd the corridors so you can hardly get into an office, that they are entitled to a higher wage and more consideration and more deliberate and intelligent consideration than the thousands of clerks in the post offices over the country who wait upon your wives and your daughters? [Applause.] I do not believe that is the judgment of any man here. But for some reason, following the lead, domination, and control of that autocratic committee, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, dominated to some extent by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who blocked legislation yesterday, and who tied up all the multitudinous affairs of the Government in order to have his way, dominated, in my judgment, by the persuasive eloquence and learning of that gentleman, you have refused to do plain justice to a body of public servants in this land who have time and time again appealed to you.

Oh, it may be that the fourth-class postmaster is not a strong or influential political factor. But, gentlemen, right is right. You threaten to abolish fourth-class post offices. Abolish them. The office was not created for the purpose of giving men positions. If they serve no public purpose they ought not to exist. If they do serve a useful purpose I defy the Post Office Department, whether under a Democratic or Republican administration, to abolish institutions which are of value to the interests of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. This does not include the fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. RUCKER. I know I am talking about water that has gone over the dam, but I want to have my say about it. I have not yet accepted the learned advice of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] or that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. No one speaks for the taxpayer, one says. If I had had the returns of the recent votes of this committee before I made my speech, probably, to be on the popular side, I would not have spoken for the fourth-class postmasters, because, it seems, they have not a friend on the Republican side and devilish few friends on the Democratic side, not as many as they ought to have. [Laughter.] I know that the proposition voted on a few minutes ago was subject to objection, but I am willing to take the best I can get. [Applause.]

I know that every fourth-class postmaster ought not to have the benefits of this law, but I say this: I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS], believing that if we wrote it into the law we might give the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in this House a demonstration of the will of the American people as asserted by their representatives and make that committee report legislation that would be just and fair to that class of public servants, and unless you do put the lash to them I want to warn you now, notwithstanding the statement of the distinguished gentleman who has charge of this bill, the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will not report that bill, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] knows that it will not.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of those who are in favor of the amendments that have been offered I want to say that if they will bring in a bill through the proper channels for an increase of pay and better working conditions for the men in the Postal Department it will have my support.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE. No, as I have only a few minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. I just wanted to say that it is a promise that will never be fulfilled, because the gentleman will never have a chance.

Mr. BURKE. I would like to yield to the gentleman, but I can not do so, as I have but four minutes myself.

I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], because I think it takes away from the Nolan minimum-wage bill the good which was originally intended and robs that bill of its intent and purpose; that is, to help the poorly paid employees who work for this Government to earn enough at least to keep body and soul together.

There is not a member of this Congress who is not personally familiar with present-day living conditions, and who does not know deep down in his heart that a workingman can not feed, clothe, and shelter a family of American children on $3 a day. Congress has acknowledged this by former action, enacting into law a provision granting a bonus of $240 per annum on all salaries up to $2,500 per annum. Yet, on account of the high cost of living, how much greater is the necessity for the poor workingman with a minimum wage of $3 a day to profit by such legislation? Why should a distinction be made in his case? The man who controls the meat, the flour, the potatoes, and the calico will not sell to the man receiving $3 a day one penny cheaper than he will to the man receiving $2,500 per annum.

There has been a disposition throughout this country and throughout all other countries in all lines of work to raise the salaries of the poorly paid employees to such a wage as will keep body and soul together. Will it be said of this Government, in this great land of plenty and boasted equality of all her citizens, that a man can not work for his Government because of the starvation wage paid by that Government? Will not Congress so legislate that the workingman will be paid a wage at this time, when living conditions are higher than ever in the history of the world and when they are soaring higher daily, that will feed, shelter, and clothe American children as American children should be fed, sheltered, and clothed? [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky will be voted down. It is nothing more or less than a modification of the amendments voted down a few moments ago. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FIELDS) there were—ayes 32, noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 2, line 15, strike out the period after the word "act" and insert in lieu thereof a colon and add the following: "And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to clerks to Senators and Representatives in Congress or to Delegates and Resident Commissioners."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I regret to take the time of the committee, because I addressed myself to this subject for a few moments on last Wednesday, but for fear that the matter may have drifted out of the minds of Members I desire to recapitulate somewhat the argument then made. The inquiry which I propounded to the chairman of the committee disclosed that he thought this bill applied to the clerks to Members and Senators and to Delegates and Resident Commissioners, and it is to put such construction beyond question and eliminate it from this bill that I offer this amendment.

The clerks to Members and Senators bear such a peculiar personal and confidential relation to those who appoint them that they should be in a classification to themselves. I think that is foundamentally true, and this has been deliberately and recently decided by the House. Therefore if we apply the minimum wage to this class of clerks, it will necessarily result in exceeding the amount of salary provided for in the bills which we have recently passed, namely, $3,200. It is manifest that a Member can apportion that amount into two salaries so as to make the lesser salary, by reason of the addition or substitution of the minimum wage, increase the $3,200 to a sum ranging roughly from $3,600 to $4,500 in the aggregate. Therefore, to relieve ourselves of this dilemma and to give effect to the legislation which has so recently passed, I have offered this amendment. I hope it will be acceptable to members of the committee, for it is their plain duty to accept it.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose this indirect and hidden method of increasing the salaries of clerks to Members. This method is equivalent to a "back-salary grab" for clerk hire, which is vicious in legislation, shocking to good conscience, and palpably violative of the expressed vote of the Members of this House upon legislation that is scarcely 10 days old. I submit that the amendment should be accepted by the gentleman in charge of the committee and unanimously approved by the Committee of the Whole. Unless we do accept this amendment, we can not defend ourselves before the country.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, there is a Latin legal maxim which translated into good English means that in too much discussion or altercation the truth is lost. Stripped of all subterfuge, stripped of all sophistry, for the friends of this measure are out in the open and are boldly declaring their purpose, stripped of all amendatory frills and deadfalls and weasels, this bill means nothing less than an announcement by Congress that it has caught the spirit of the times, that it recognizes that a new light has burst upon the world, that a new era has set in, a new epoch started, that it is the beginning of the new dispensation, that the American people are preparing to meet the great future and its trials that loom large on the horizon even now by adopting a minimum wage, and that from time to time Congress will build upon that foundation the superstructure representing the advanced hopes and aims of the people in the direction of true greatness and happiness. And our hope is that the example of our Government will be an inspiration, a suggestion, a persuasive declaration, if you will, to the industrial and commercial interests of the country to adopt the policy of the Nation and make its minimum wage their own, thereby subduing the rapidly growing discontent of our countrymen as announced through editorials, preachments through the pulpit, and great speeches and orations by the gifted speakers of the land.

Mr. Chairman, some years ago I heard a distinguished member of the bar, addressing the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in the old Cabildo down in New Orleans, where the Louisiana Purchase was signed and consummated, tell by way of illustration of the point which he had in mind, and which for some reason he could not felicitously convey to the court, the finest story that I have ever heard. He had been vainly striving to have the court cast aside all of the irrelevancies and confusing side issues which he thought were being injected into the case and see the one great outstanding principle that was involved. The story made a profound impression upon my mind, as a few years before that I had been in the very place that served for the theater for the splendid legend which he related. Upon a wall in the refectory of a great religious institute Leonardi da Vinci had painted his masterpiece—one of the great pictures of this world—The Last Supper. When he had finished what is destined to live as long as the Christian religion holds sway over the mind of man, he brought an artist friend to witness its unveiling before it would be given to the world. Awed, amazed, profoundly affected by that crowning glory of the painter's brush, the friend, choking with emotion, took a step toward the picture, saying, "Magnificent; it is so realistic, so natural, that I feel as if I could take the chalice from the table." Da Vinci looked for a moment at that indescribably great, yes, divine, creation, holy to the devout and impressive to the irreligious, and muttered the great sorrow that was in his soul, for he knew that while mankind for all the generations that were to sweep over the world after he was gone and forever would regard it as the perfection of art and the most holy and sublime creation that had come to the Christian people he had failed in his great purpose. With one stroke of the brush the cup went out of the picture. It was not to be the central figure of that immortality; it was the pale, pure face of the Nazarene that was to be the central, all-engrossing, all-absorbing figure that was to seize upon the imagination and spirit of the beholder.

I have never forgotten that story. I will never forget the refectory. But as an evidence of the fact that nothing can withstand the mutations of time or even those of man, when Napoleon's army crossed the Alps and poured over the plains of Lombardy, this refectory was used as a barracks, and to accommodate the soldiers a door was cut through the wall on which was painted the original of what is in copy form in the home of all those who worship at the cross and in the church of Him who died on Calvary Hill.

Applying that narrative to the matter we are discussing to-day, and it is applicable, because it is poverty and lowliness that I am discussing, let me appeal to you not to lose sight of the underlying principle of this bill and the tidings of great joy that it will bring the humble of this great land by obscuring its meaning with amendments that will make it a mere salary raiser instead of the mudsill and foundation for the new order that has come to the world. This bill is the beginning of the vindication of those principles for which flesh and blood have struggled through all the ages.

Mr. Chairman, I am tired, heart weary, of hearing Members of this House talk in nickles and dimes and pennies, as if they believe that the jingle of silver and the rustle of greenbacks is the only music the people of our country want to hear—as if we were a sordid dollar-chasing Nation, without hope for the amelioration of the miseries of the poor or a desire to reach for those higher and nobler things that are the aim of a great and splendid people.

The American people believe with Kingsley:

> Do noble things,
> Not dream them all day long,
> And so make life, death, and that vast forever
> One grand, sweet song.

Fear not, believe not, the presidential election will be determined, decided, upon such paltry matters as what money was saved by this legislator or that, but upon those principles of government which will make for a general welfare and the blessings of liberty and freedom that will have a real meaning, a meaning that will carry joy and happiness to our men and women who are saddened at the thought that in a large measure the vicissitudes of existence have offset the emotional value of the high-sounding declaration of benevolence contained in the purpose of our Government as ordained in its preamble. Like the sun, that daily has its magnificent rise, that preamble is again going to shine effulgently upon our people, and in the evening it will become—

> The rainbow to the storms of life,
> The evening beam that smiles the clouds away.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I thank you. I want to say in connection with this bill, however, because I, like all speakers, have wandered far afield, I have not only the interest of an American who loves his country and who wants to see it prosper in all branches of its society, but I want to say, gentlemen, that I have a deep and abiding interest in this bill and desire to see it passed because I wish to see its principles vindicated and then applied to all of the activities of this Government in all the business affairs of our country. Why do I wish it? Four-fifths of the men who discuss labor, poverty, the simple annals of the poor, and I say this without offense to anyone, yes, four-fifths of all, labor conventions excepted, speak from the theoretical standpoint, but in listening to me you are listening to one who has suffered the direct stings of poverty, for when I look back, Mr. Chairman, to the precipitous heights I had to climb in order to stand here among the legislators of my country I feel that I would not again for all the gold that ever came out of the mines of Golconda or of Cripple Creek—I might do it for the glory and grandeur and tragedy of it, but not for all the money in this world—tread that heartbreaking, sorrow-laden path again. But I can speak of it! I was born and reared in a section of the city where from my cradle I saw poverty, and I made up my mind in my earliest day that if ever the occasion presented itself I would endeavor to strike down this hundred-handed, hydra-headed, argus-eyed monster, and I believe the only way is to adopt a bill of this kind. Mr. Chairman, four or five years ago I saw a film picture shown in the city of New Orleans—and in all probability you saw it, too—Lord Roberts inspecting the so-called English volunteers. At that time the Teuton was on his way to Paris.

In my lifetime I have seen anguish, sorrow, despair, and degradation written across the faces of men and women. I have seen them in reformatories; I have seen them in jails; I have seen them in penitentiaries; I have seen them on the sorrowing road to the gallows; but never, before or since, did I see heartbreaking degradation and tragic suffering written so clearly across the human countenance as I saw upon the faces of those derelicts of London who were being mustered into the service. I saw on the face of that hero of England the sadness of a great sorrow. He recognized England had not been true to her trust; that she had neglected her duty to her poor children, the mudsills of her society; that she had not taken care of the girls, who, after all, make men, who by their poverty, by their run-down condition, had sent into the world men who could not combat with its struggles, and who were now in Britain's hour of need, when she was to slowly climb her Calvary, when she was to undergo her Golgotha, half-starved and all but hopeless, men whose youth bore no flowers in its branches, whose hopes burned in ashes away, instead of the well-fed, upstanding men that spring from nourished women and fathers that poverty has not crushed. England's lack of preparedness in arms and her neglect of her flesh and blood—of English boys and girls—almost led to her downfall. It is true they died like men, but the fields where the poppies grow are the burial places for probably 250,000 Englishmen. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. O'CONNOR. God grant that this picture which I saw, and which I trust you will remember, will be to my country a solemn warning. Do not neglect our poor. Do not let them be confronted with that poverty which beats the heart out of the bravest human being. Remember that the poor are our kith and our kin, our blood, "and once at least our paths have crossed."

Vote for this bill and pray that the God of the nations be with us and our people and our country.

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of truth with falsehood,
For the good or evil side;
Some great cause, God's new Messiah,
Offering each the bloom or blight,
Parts the goats upon the left hand
And the sheep upon the right;
And that choice goes by forever,
'Twixt that darkness and light.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE].

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The other day I listened with a great deal of sorrow to a gentleman in this House characterize the membership as hypocritical, and I desire to say from my short experience among the membership of this House that I have never been with or associated with 435 men whose average sobriety is higher than the average of this House. [Applause.] Of course, the country could not see the twinkle in the eye of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] nor observe his jovial face as he spoke on that occasion, but the country ought not to labor under the impression that there is a body of men legislating for the country who are hypocritical when it comes to the method of their life. [Applause.] And but a few minutes ago an equally genial gentleman, and perhaps not meaning the exact language he employed, suggested that on both sides of the aisle Members were hypocritical. Now, these insinuations do this body no good before the country. In the eyes of the country we may have fallen low enough without the help of our own membership. We should endeavor to raise ourselves in the esteem of the citizenship of the country.

But I do not as a new Member endeavor to lecture older men. I simply suggest at this point that if this amendment is adopted we give a handle to the hammer which these two gentlemen have supplied to the country. If you will adopt a minimum wage for all the other departments of the Government and refuse to adopt a minimum wage for your own clerks, then, indeed, the country may say they act a little bit hypocritically.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACCRATE. I gladly yield.

Mr. RUCKER. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia is not adopted, would it be possible under the provisions of this bill to increase the salary of Members' clerks?

Mr. MACCRATE. I can see no way to increase a statutory limitation already put on the salaries.

Mr. RUCKER. The amendment, as I understand it, is to make it impossible to do that or place that construction on the law.

Mr. MACCRATE. As I understand it, you might make a minimum of less than $1,080 for one of your clerks, and I say to you, sir, and I say to the House, that I do not desire to be put in the position of advocating a minimum wage, a living wage, for every other branch of the Government and not say to my own clerk, "You are entitled to a living minimum wage."

Mr. RUCKER. I wanted to get the gentleman's view about it.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UPSHAW. Does not the gentleman think that as a general proposition it is better for the Government to pay a little too much of wages to a few people rather than commit itself to a narrow policy as to all who work for it?

Mr. MACCRATE. I am not ready to make a statement on that general proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is recognized.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is not present. We had a little colloquy a few minutes ago about a matter which I desire to have settled. He said I made a misstatement, but, of course, he did not say it in an odious way. However, I wanted to show that when I was speaking I knew what I was talking about. I stated that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads brought in a bill which did not give any increase whatever to any country employees of the Post Office except to the rural carriers, and it only gave to them 15 per cent, whereas the bill gave to city employees 20 to 30 per cent. The bill as reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads raised the salaries of the city clerks to $1,000 and $1,500. Prior to that time the clerks had been getting from $800 to $1,200. That was an increase of exactly what I said—20 to 30 per cent. Then the gentleman from Illinois stated, further, that I was mistaken about the committee not having reported an increase for clerks in third-class post-offices.

I have here before me the bill as reported by the committee. It has no reference whatever—and I have read it carefully—to including clerks in third-class post offices. It does not include them. But in the bill as the House passed it we do find this language:

Including allowances for clerk hire at third-class post offices.

By reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 4034, of March 25, 1918, we find this language:

The Clerk read as follows:
Mr. CARTER moves to amend by inserting on page 2, line 18, after the word "employees," the words: "Including allowances for clerk hire at third-class post offices."

And on page 4035, after about a page and a half of discussion, we find this amendment was carried on a division by tellers by a vote of 64 ayes to 38 noes. So the bill as it was brought into the House contained no reference whatever to and did not include clerks at third-class offices, did not even give them the 15 per cent raise.

The gentleman from Illinois did not vote at all. I insisted on having him vote with me at the time, and he said: "I am a member of the committee. I think you are right, but I do not want to vote against the committee."

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me recite a word further. The bill as reported by the Post Office Committee was so manifestly unfair to the country employees that the House made several amendments equalizing their pay along with city employees, increasing compensation to the poorly paid country employees. Then what happened? The bill went over to the Senate, but this legislative bill increasing salaries never was considered by the Senate at all. It was buried in the committee and never brought into the Senate for consideration. Instead of considering this legislative bill, which had passed the House with amendments doing justice by the fourth-class postmasters, third-class post-office employees, and other country postal employees, the Senate placed riders on the Post Office appropriation bill providing bountiful increases for city employees, but omitting some of the most necessary increases for country employees. The bill was sent to conference, agreed to, then brought back here, and under whip and spur, during the closing hours of a session, as I recall, pressed through the House, not on the merits of the increases but under the necessity of furnishing funds sufficient to keep the departments of the Government going. Now, that is the truth about the whole matter and explains how the will of this House was defeated and how the underpaid postal employees working out in the rural sections were euchred out of their just rights.

Now, I simply make that statement in order that in the future our Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will understand and the House will understand exactly the conditions about it. If any such measure is brought in in the future, the House will understand the situation and ought to see to it that the country postal employees are provided with a living wage. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to close debate on this amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I would like five minutes on this particular amendment.

Mr. NOLAN. I will ask unanimous consent that the debate on this particular amendment be closed in 10 minutes. That will include 5 minutes for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] and 5 minutes for myself.

Mr. BLANTON. That will not preclude debate on another amendment?

Mr. NOLAN. No.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] will agree to this amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. When we passed the bill a few days ago increasing the clerk-hire allowance to Members we provided an allowance of $3,200 to be paid to not more than two clerks. It was evidently the intention of Congress that we retain one clerk at $2,000, which was the salary of our secretaries before this last increase was made, and another at $1,200, if the Member should need such other clerk. An effort was made during the consideration of the bill to put a limitation upon it which would definitely fix the salary of one clerk at $2,000 and the salary of another at $1,200. But some gentlemen made the argument that they had old and trusted clerks, and they wanted to put them on the roll at $2,500, and give the remainder to another clerk, and therefore the House refused to put that limitation upon it. I was earnestly in favor of limiting the salary to any one clerk to $2,000, and did all that I could to get that limitation agreed to. The RECORD of that date will show my efforts in that behalf.

Now, under present conditions of affairs, as soon as some Member puts upon the roll a clerk at $2,500, such clerk then becomes an employee of the United States Government and receives the bonus of $240 per annum, which would make a total compensation of $2,740 for that one clerk.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I can not yield now. Suppose he puts the other clerk on the roll at $700. That clerk would receive the $700 and the $240 bonus, making a total salary of $940, and if this minimum-wage bill passes he would undoubtedly, unless you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], receive the benefits of it, because it would be the latest expression of the will of Congress, and would be the law, and thus the employee whom the Member of Congress put on the roll at $700 would immediately have his salary increased to $1,080, and if the Good amendment is voted down in the House such employee would receive $240 more, which would be one clerk upon the roll at $1,320 and another at $2,740, making a total clerk-hire drawing to such Member of $4,060; and I defy any member of the committee to successfully controvert that fact under the language of these different bills.

Now, I submit, gentlemen, that though we frequently show little consideration to the Public Treasury in this House, it is time that we were calling some halt. [Applause.] In 1916 the Members of Congress made out on $660,000 total allowance a year for clerk hire, later we raised it to $880,000 per annum, and now we have added to it until it is nearly $1,800,000 for the next fiscal year, and if you do not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia you have left the door open to increase it several hundred thousand dollars more. And so I submit that there ought not to be a dissenting vote to that amendment. [Applause.]

And while I do not think there should be a dissenting vote, still I am perfectly well aware that there will be. I presume there will be enough votes to defeat it, because my observation is that usually the amendment which cuts down public expenditures meets with hard sledding, and the amendment which increases them usually meets with easy sailing.

The public may wake up to the reckless waste and extravagance of Congress some day, but I am not optimistic enough to hope that they will do it very soon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] offered an amendment which violates the principle of this bill, that Members of Congress will reserve the right to themselves to pay employees in their offices less than the Government of the United States pays to its employees. That is what you are going to do, gentlemen. There has been a great deal of talk—I will not say scandal, but a great deal of comment—about the way Members handled their clerk-hire money in times gone by. It resulted in the last Congress in providing $3,200 for clerk hire for Members, and the Members who advocated that advocated it on this ground: We gave them the opportunity to employ an additional stenographer at $1,200 a year.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I can not yield. I have but five minutes.

It was given on the ground that each Member must employ two clerks and distribute that $3,200 as he saw fit. And in addition to that, mind you, each one of these two clerks, under the ruling, draws $240 a year bonus. It means $3,680 for clerk hire to each Member of this House. Now, the man who employs one clerk—and I understand some men do—at $3,000 a year—and I understand some of them employ them in their home cities at $200—that particular employee in the home city gets from the Government of the United States in the way of bonus $40 a year more than is paid by the Member. How can you Members of Congress justify an exception of this kind?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. No; I have only five minutes. You say to the Government of the United States in all departments, "You must pay a minimum wage of $90 a month to all the employees."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Then you say you are going to exempt your own employees.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. NOLAN. Just a minute. I can not yield. I have but five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. NOLAN. You say you are going to exempt your own employees. How can you justify that? There is absolutely no foundation for the statement that if this bill passes it raises the clerk hire beyond $3,200 a year. There is an absolute limitation on the clerk hire to Members of Congress. What this would do would be to say to Members of Congress, as to everybody else, "You can not employ them for less than $90 a month." It would mean that you would have to apportion your $3,200 on a basis of $90 to one person and the rest to another clerk, plus the bonus. That is absolutely right. That can not be questioned. If you adopt this amendment, you open the door to discrimination.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman point out the reason?

Mr. NOLAN. I am trying to point out the reason.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will address the Chair when they want recognition.

Mr. NOLAN. Three thousand two hundred dollars is allowed, and you can appoint two clerks. In addition to that $3,200, each one of these two clerks draws $240 bonus. It means $3,680 to each Member for clerk hire. You can apportion that as you like; $3,000 to one and $200 to another, or $2,000 to one and $1,200 to another; any way you want to. If you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, you stand before this country in the light of saying to the Government of the United States, "You can not pay less than $90 a month, or $3 a day, but we Members of Congress reserve the right in the distribution of this money to pay less than a living wage." That is the thing that is involved in this amendment. I could not agree to it. Other Members of the House may think it is a good amendment. I say no; that it violates absolutely the principle upon which this bill is founded. You can not afford to adopt this amendment if you want to be right and if you want to stand behind the principle upon which this bill is founded. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MONTAGUE) there were—ayes 56, noes 98.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. NOLAN and Mr. MONTAGUE.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 115.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 7, after the word "clerks," add the following:

"Provided, That fourth-class postmasters shall hereafter be paid the sum of $240 per year in addition to the compensation paid them under existing law."

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment provides for a bonus in addition to their salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 7, after the word "clerks," add the following:

"Provided, fourth-class postmasters shall hereafter be paid not less than $720 per annum."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think the issues involved here have been pretty well thrashed out, and I do not care to discuss the matter at length, but simply to call attention to the fact that for a long period of time there has been no increase allowed in the compensation of fourth-class postmasters; and as a result of this attitude on the part of the Government many post offices have been abandoned that should be continued. If this amendment is adopted by the Congress, it will establish a minimum payment to postmasters of $720 per year. I do not believe there is any Member of this House who thinks that a man should hold the position of postmaster and assume the responsibility which the Government places upon the shoulders of postmasters in this country for less than $720 per year. The mail that goes to persons in the country is just as important to them as that which goes to persons in the city is to the people of the city. It is important that all the postal facilities should be furnished to people all over the United States. This Government can well afford to do that. During the last three months I have received notices of the discontinuance of 10 different post offices in the district that I represent, simply because the Post Office Department could get no one to perform the duties of those offices under the present conditions. Before the war they were able to get people to fill those positions, but at present they are unable to do so.

Further, I have letters from many of the postmasters, who say they are going to continue to run the offices from patriotic motives and for the good of the community. I have other cases where citizens of the community are making up a little bonus to the fourth-class postmasters.

It does seem to me that the Congress could well afford to pay a minimum salary of $720 a year. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman, as I stated awhile ago, the salaries of 20,000 postmasters in the United States are less than $180 per annum, and at those offices the salary consists of the entire revenue of the Government received at those offices. So if the salaries of these officers were increased to $720 per annum the effect would be the discontinuance of all those offices.

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose particularly to discuss the statement made a few moments ago by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], who attempts to show that the Post Office Committee failed to bring in a measure here increasing the allowance for clerk hire in third-class post offices. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] brings here a bill which was reported by the Post Office Committee on which there was not a recommendation for an increase; but the gentleman from Oklahoma overlooked the fact that the Post Office Committee previous to that time had reported a bill in the Sixty-fifth Congress which did increase the allowance for clerks in third-class post offices by 50 per cent. I have that law before me and will read from it.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDALL of California. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Was that bill ever acted upon?

Mr. RANDALL of California. It is a law.

Mr. CARTER. Had that bill been acted upon?

Mr. RANDALL of California. It had been acted upon. It is the Post Office appropriation bill passed in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. CARTER. Does the gentleman not know that the increase in the Post Office appropriation bill for allowances for third-class-post-office clerks was placed in the bill in the Senate and not in the House?

Mr. RANDALL of California. No; that increase was put in by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House, and I will read the law.

Mr. CARTER. The bill as it passed the House did not contain any increase.

Mr. RANDALL of California. The gentleman did not exhibit this appropriation bill. He presented a special bill.

Mr. CARTER. I referred to this in my remarks. Here is what I said. I said that when this salary bill went to the Senate it was not acted upon by the Senate, but the Senate placed into the Post Office appropriation bill such allowances as they saw fit, and that went to conference.

Mr. RANDALL of California. The gentleman is taking my time. The gentleman did not call attention to this. Here is what the Post Office Committee acted upon:

For allowance to third-class post offices: No allowance in excess of $450 shall be granted where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200.

In the law of 1918 that allowance was $300, and we increased it 50 per cent.

Mr. CARTER. There is no controversy between the gentleman and me. The statement I made was this, that in the bill brought in for the increase in salaries——

Mr. RANDALL of California. I am talking about the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. CARTER. That in the bill for the increase in salaries the clerks for third-class postmasters were not taken care of. They were taken care of afterwards by having it inserted in the Senate and not in the Post Office Committee of the House.

Mr. RANDALL of California. I remember distinctly that it was discussed in the Post Office Committee of the House and adopted there.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas will not be agreed to. The discussion this afternoon will probably result in some benefit in giving consideration to the salaries not only of the fourth-class postmasters but of the postal employees. I do not think this is the place to legislate for other employees. I think we can get more intelligent consideration of these things through the Post Office Committee, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I came to the House with the firm conviction that I was going to support this bill against all amendments. I am in sympathy with the spirit of the bill. But inasmuch as the fourth-class postmaster has been long neglected, and inasmuch as this amendment does give him proper recognition, and inasmuch as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas does not interfere with the general spirit of the bill, I am in favor of it. While we are thinking of the man in overalls—and I would not vote to take one thing from the man who toils in the city—we must remember that the man between the plowhandles is also one of the twin builders of our civilization. The country post office that has been so long the "glimmering goal" of the rural community—the center—the trysting place of community activities, has been almost put out of business by the rural free delivery. This means that unusual burdens have fallen upon the fourth-class postmasters who yet remain, and inasmuch as this will favor them and will not take a dollar from the city sons of toil I heartily favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Texas) there were 40 ayes and 115 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, should the Good amendment be defeated by action of the House, and undoubtedly it will be by a Republican majority, then under this bill every 18-year-old negro porter, every 18-year-old negro messenger, every 18-year-old negro watchman, every 18-year-old negro chargirl in the employ of this Government—and there are thousands of them—would receive a salary of $110 a month, and under existing laws they would each get a month's vacation each year on full pay.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I have only five minutes, and am sorry I can not yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maine. Now, I want to show the Congress that such a proposal is ridiculous in the extreme and is out of all reason and out of all proportion to the salaries paid white men and women throughout our land by the private business enterprises of our Nation. I want to read you some excerpts from what people say in my district on that question:

Mr. A. W. Sledge, editor of the Ledger, the daily newspaper of Ballinger, Tex., advises that there are assistant cashiers in the banks of Runnels County, Tex., who do not get over $100 per month; that the salaries of bookkeepers in said banks range from a minimum of $65 to a maximum of $100 per month; that the tellers in said banks receive $100 per month; that the clerks in said banks receive from $40 to $85 per month; that the janitors in said banks receive $30 per month; that said banks of Runnels County allow only 10 days' vacation on pay per year; that there are many women clerking in the stores in Runnels County, working nine hours per day, on salaries ranging from $40 to $65 per month; that the people at home are becoming aroused over the extravagant ideas of Congress in wasting the public money in granting salaries out of all reason and proportion to value of service rendered, and want it checked.

Mr. Harry G. Hubert, editor of the Democrat-Voice, the leading newspaper published in Coleman County, Tex., advises me that there are bank cashiers in Coleman County, Tex., who do not get more than $100 per month; that there are some assistant cashiers in banks there who do not get more than $85 per month; that the bookkeepers in the banks of Coleman County get salaries ranging from $60 to $125 per month; that the janitors in said banks get salaries ranging from $35 to $60 per month; that the night watchmen in said banks get salaries ranging from $50 to $60 per month.

Mr. W. H. Carpenter, editor of the Chief Exponent, the leading and oldest newspaper published in Comanche County, Tex., advises me that the bookkeepers in the banks of Comanche County, Tex., receive salaries ranging from $700 per year to $1,500; that many of said bookkeepers work for $700 per year, which is a little less than $60 per month, and that the people are against Congress fixing salaries out of all reason and proportion.

The Daily Index Co., publishing the leading daily newspaper in Palo Pinto County, Tex., advises me that in Palo Pinto County, Tex., the average salary paid by the banks to bank clerks is $75 per month, and that the minimum salary paid to bookkeepers in said banks is $100 per month.

This Congress is as wild as a March hare when the subject of Government salaries and rights of labor unions are under consideration.

Have you ever seen a west Texas cowboy rope the forefeet of a running yearling? That is what is going to happen to some of us Congressmen unless we change about and quit throwing away the public money and thus placing additional burdens upon the already tax-burdened shoulders of the people.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let we say to the gentleman from Texas that they ought to have a minimum-wage commission in his State.

Mr. BLANTON. They ought to have a little more reason in this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks those wages are adequate.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will give me more time I will answer him.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, there is one justification for this age limit in the bill, and only one in the minds of the committee. The Committee on Labor felt that if it was a right principle to draft a man to fight in the Army at the age of 18 years they ought to be entitled to the benefits of the minimum wage. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 5 ayes and 143 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "clerks," insert:
"Provided, That hereafter postmasters of the fourth-class shall receive an annual compensation of not less than $250 plus a reasonable allowance for rent, light, and fuel.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. NOLAN. It reduces the amount provided in this bill, which is a minimum-wage bill, and it is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. On the amendment or on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. RUCKER. I do not; I want to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate on the section and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. I object.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on section 1 and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this bill is subject to amendment, and when a Member offers an amendment under the rules of the House he is entitled to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not well taken. The House can control its own proceedings. The motion is that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. There has been no debate on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order was made to the amendment, and the point of order was sustained.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. But the amendment of the gentleman from Texas has not been reported.

Mr. WINGO. I do not want the committee to say that it is within the power of the man having charge of the bill to have a section read and one amendment offered that might be buncombe, debated, and then move that all debate on the whole section be closed.

Mr. NOLAN. We have been discussing this bill for the last three hours.

Mr. WINGO. Suppose we have? [Cries of "The regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were 133 ayes and 19 noes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken; and but 18 Members rising, tellers were denied.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. If subsequent amendments are offered to the section, they can not be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments can be offered, but debate is closed.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, the committee does not care to discuss any proposition except the one pending. In other words, close the mouth of those who want to extend this to country Government employees?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "clerks," add the following:
"Provided, That fourth-class postmasters shall receive a compensation of not less than $320 per annum.".

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WINGO. Upon what ground?

Mr. NOLAN. I make the point of order that it is not germane to the bill, which is a minimum-wage bill.

Mr. WINGO. Does not the amendment seek to fix a minimum?

Mr. NOLAN. It provides for a specific amount, and it creates a differential in the rates.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman claim and will the Chair rule that we have to take the standard of differential or minimum wage reported by the committee, that we have to take the minimum that the committee reports, that we can not make it larger or smaller or qualify the minimum? That is a most astounding proposition, that this House can not fix any minimum that it desires, that it can not classify any employees of the Government because this is a minimum wage bill for the employees of the Government. To say that we can not take out one class and say that we will have this minimum for this class and another for another class is a ridiculous proposition.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in addition to what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has said, that this bill specifically exempts fourth-class postmasters and does not fix their compensation at all. It does not apply to them. The gentleman from Texas proposes an amendment that applies to fourth-class postmasters, and this bill does not fix the minimum wage for them at all.

Mr. NOLAN. The bill provides specifically a minimum rate and certain exemptions with fixed minimum rates of $3 per day, $90 per month, or $1,080 per year, and an hourly rate of 37½ cents. An amendment which seeks to fix a differential providing for a different minimum wage is not germane.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman mean to say that the only minimum that we can consider is the one reported by the committee? That is the logic of his argument.

Mr. NOLAN. I say that you are trying to create a differential rather than a minimum.

Mr. WINGO. Can we amend three and make it four?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the Chair if the Chair has not already ruled on this matter and if this debate is not out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Chair has ruled upon this question, and that debate is out of order, but the Chair did not care to shut off debate. The Chair wishes to state to the gentleman from Arkansas that if the amendment had been for the purpose of fixing a minimum wage for fourth-class postmasters it would have been in order, but this is not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is what it does; that the wage shall not be less than $340 per year.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What has the Chair ruled?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 109, noes 47.

So the decision of the Chair was ordered to stand as the decision of the committee.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HUDDLESTON: Page 2, line 15, after the words "this act," insert:
"Provided, That in computing the pay which postmasters shall be paid, the Postmaster General shall estimate the time each such postmaster is required to serve on a daily average in the performance of his duties, and shall pay him not less than 37½ cents per hour for such time."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I know the committee is very impatient. I am very impatient myself to get through with this bill, but I trust that Members will be willing to listen for just a moment, because I fear that we are in great danger of doing a deserving class of public servants a very serious injustice. I ask that representatives of the great city populations consider the situation of the fourth-class postmaster. You have not any of them in your districts, perhaps, but some of us have. I have not a great many of them, but they are very deserving men and women. There can be no denial of the fact that they are the most poorly paid of all the employees of the Government. They get less for what they do than anyone else who is connected with the Government. There are 20,000 of these postmasters in the United States who receive less than $180 per annum, and some of them receive almost nothing. The compensation attached to some of these positions is so ridiculously small as to amount to very little more than the privilege of reading the postal cards that may be passing through. [Laughter.]

I realize that some of the amendments that have been offered on behalf of the fourth-class postmasters have gone to an unreasonable length. I have voted for all of these amendments, but realize that while they would do rough justice to fourth-class postmasters as a class, in certain cases they would give the officer more pay than would be proper. I have realized that it would be necessary to iron out inequalities and to modify the measure, as would be done in the Senate. Some postmasters do very little, and, of course, they get very little, and it is right that they should get but little return for little work. But a man ought to get fair pay for what he does, whether it be much or little. The gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. NOLAN] would not for a moment advocate paying these fourth-class postmasters less for the time they actually put in than the minimum he fixes in the bill for other Government employees, and the purpose of this amendment is to secure to these fourth-class postmasters a minimum of 37½ cents per hour for the time they actually put in.

If a postmaster puts in only one hour a day, he will receive only 37½ cents for his day's work; if he puts in 10 hours, he will get $3.75 a day. There is nothing unreasonable or extravagant about that. This ought to be done. No man on the floor of the House will deny the justice of paying these postmasters as much as 37½ cents an hour for the time they actually put in on their jobs as computed by the Postmaster General.

I do not favor extravagance, of course, but I do favor justice. This great Government can not afford to be unjust even to its humblest employee. People sometimes laugh at fourth-class postmasters. Why do they laugh at them? It is chiefly because of the poor pay they get. The poor pay attached to it makes the office ridiculous. These postmasters represent our Government; they are about the only Government officers that some people ever see. The office should have some dignity about it. The way to dignify it is to pay a fair compensation to the man or woman who holds it. Why, a man can not afford to accept the position at many post offices unless he can run a store or some other business in connection with it, so that he can not give all his time to serving the patrons of the office. We ought to change this. We ought to make a postmastership worth holding for its own sake.

But the argument is made that postmasters are not dealt with in this bill; that we ought to except them so as to leave them to look for relief to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The answer to that argument is that these men and women have been reaching out their hands to that committee; they have been appealing to them for help for years and years. These men and women have been asking that committee that justice be done them, but it has not been done. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has answered with soft words and promises, but they have done very little. Postmasters are still going on at the old rate; some of them are working from 10 to 16 hours a day and receiving $40 to $50 per month. It is wrong. It is an injustice; it is not fair on the part of Congress that we should pass back the appeals that these men and women are making and direct them to the committee which has heard their appeals in the past and failed to respond to them. I think we ought to do something for these people now. [Applause.] [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were—ayes 45, noes 109.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "act," insert:
"And provided further, That the minimum wage of temporary clerks and carriers of the Post Office Department shall be 50 cents per hour, and that each permanent employee of the Post Office Department in the classified service shall receive the special bonus of $240 per annum during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, as provided for other Government employees, and this shall be in addition to the amount otherwise provided."

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment, which provides a bonus on a minimum-wage bill.

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. NOLAN. I will reserve it.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in the beginning I am in favor of the bill itself, but am against the Good amendment. I offer this amendment in entire good faith, because it has a direct bearing upon the very serious situation in the Postal Service. In the principal city in my district it is really almost impossible to employ and keep efficient labor in the Post Office Service. The situation is so bad to-day that they are 30 clerks short in the city of Akron. They no sooner bring in a new clerk than he becomes dissatisfied at the low pay, goes across the street, and hires out at a new job at a higher rate, and it is physically impossible for the men who are left there to handle the work efficiently. I appeal to the membership of this House to give relief to these conditions, which are real and not fancied.

The minimum rate paid for temporary clerks, I understand, is 40 cents an hour. This is less than the ordinary laborer gets, and I can not blame these men who are called upon to pass tests of mentality for refusing to work for these wages, and you can not keep these temporary clerks who are so urgently needed and from whom you expect to develop worthwhile permanent employees. As far as the postal employees generally are concerned, I understand that they have been given an increase of only $200 a year; and I wish to say, gentlemen, that in view of the rapid rise of the cost of living it is impossible to keep good efficient men in the service in adequate numbers. I offer this amendment in the utmost good faith, because there is a desperate situation in the city of Akron and there is an equally desperate situation in every other city. Many good men have remained in the service in spite of the hard conditions under which they have been forced, in the hope that Congress would speedily give them the just consideration to which they are entitled. They expect proper attention to their urgent needs and just claims. They expect it now, not many weary months hence, when many more good men will have lost hope and left the service. Nothing more vitally concerns the business, civic, and social life of this Nation than the Postal Department. It requires and deserves capable men of character and capacity and dependability. You must pay them what they are worth according to present standards of value or you must expect to ruin the service.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to say anything in reference to his point of order?

Mr. NOLAN. The point of order is that it provides for a bonus and is not germane to a minimum-wage bill.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman contend that compensation may not be in the nature of a bonus or that it can be only in the nature of an hourly, a daily, or weekly scale of wages?

Mr. NOLAN. I am contending that the gentleman's amendment provides for a bonus and it is not germane to a minimum-wage bill.

Mr. WINGO. He will not care what you call it if you give it to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The first part of the gentleman's amendment is in order, but that portion with reference to the bonus is not in order.

Mr. DAVEY. Then I desire to strike out the last portion in reference to——

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done, and inasmuch as a part of the amendment is not in order, then the whole amendment is not in order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. DAVEY. Then I shall offer the first part of the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, add "Provided hereafter all fourth-class postmasters shall be paid a minimum of not less than $1 per day."

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if this amendment has the approval of the Postmaster General?

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order at this time that the gentleman's amendment is——

Mr. WALSH. It is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is too late. It is overruled.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make one appeal in behalf of a class of people who have no organization formed and no organized propaganda in their behalf—for the man who lives in the country who wants his mail and is entitled to it just the same as the man who lives in the city. Before the cost of living became so high, it was easy to maintain what is ordinarily termed the "country club house," the post offices where the various people met and secured their mail and carried on the conversation of the neighborhood. But now, since the cost of living has become so high, it has been absolutely impossible for them to maintain these post offices in the country districts and thus enable the people who are tilling the soil of this country to receive their mail at regular intervals.

Now, I submit that there is no one who ought to be willing to deny the man who follows the plow the privilege of getting his mail simply to save the paltry sum that would be saved by not allowing this amendment. If you permit this minimum to be paid to postmasters of this country, then, by supplementing their work with the other little business which they can conduct in the community, they will be able to maintain the post office, and many of these letters which we are daily receiving from all over this country will cease to come.

Now, I ask you in behalf of the people who have not organized and made a raid upon Congres to do this. This is one class of people that have not been the beneficiaries of any of the recent increases. We increased the clerks $120 per year and then $240 per year, and have made various other increases. And by the very terms of this bill we provide increases for practically everyone else in this Government. I submit that we can well afford to say to the country communities, where the products of this country are grown, "We will allow you $320 as a minimum and furnish you with postmasters." The drift has been recently, for the last few years, very much from the country districts to the cities, simply because the advantages have been with the people who live in the cities. Can you hope to have this condition remedied when you grant people in the cities certain rights and deny them to those who live in the country? Many here pay tribute to the country people and then vote against their rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be voted down. It shows the inconsistency of the gentleman that he offered at one stage of the bill an amendment for $750 and now goes down to $320.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] says that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] shows inconsistency because he first made an effort to get $700 or more for these underpaid servants of the public, and because he could not get that he charges him with being inconsistent because he tries to get a dollar a day.

If it is impossible for a saddle-colored messenger, sitting in a swivel chair in the corridors of a public building in Washington, to maintain a decent standard of living without getting $3 a day, I maintain it is impossible for the hard-working country postmaster, working 10 hours a day, to maintain a decent standard of living on the $1 a day which is proposed by the amendment.

You are charged with inconsistency if you refuse to consider any amendment except that which comes down to the narrow standard of the committee which reported this bill. They are wonderful gentlemen. It might be better for the world if we had more dreamers like them in legislative halls. I do not criticize their handiwork, but it comes with poor grace for them to charge inconsistency when they pick out one class of employees and object to our voting to do the same justice to another class of employees. Since when did it become more necessary to give a living wage to men in the cities and deny it to the workers of the towns and the country? You and not me are inconsistent.

It is the object here to furnish a minimum wage, and why should we not have a minimum wage that destroys the committee's standard if it is a better minimum wage standard? Why should gentlemen inveigh against others who are trying to help these poorly paid Government employees and charge them with inconsistency? It is a serious problem in the country communities of the United States to get employees to handle the mail. I know in certain places where rural routes are located they can not get postmasters to run the offices because the remuneration is not sufficient. I submit that a fourth-class postmaster, giving 10 hours a day, although he may not work continuously that 10 hours a day, but must be on duty all the time, works harder than the majority of these saddle-colored messengers that sit down here in these departments. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 102.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, after the word "act," insert:
"And provided further, That the minimum pay of temporary clerks and carriers of the Post Office Department shall be 50 cents per hour, and that the minimum salaries of permanent employees of the Post Office Department in the classified service shall be not less than $240 per annum above the amount already provided by law during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920."

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DAVEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks on the amendment which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. My amendment is to strike out the proviso beginning on line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUCKER: On line 9, after the word "years," strike out the remainder of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Then I ask unanimous consent to address myself to the amendment.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree to that.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman is making a mistake. There is not a man strong enough in the United States to coerce my vote. I wish to withdraw my amendment, Mr. Chairman. I want to say to the gentleman that the labor gang can not run me.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the pending amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. Do I understand that the chairman of the committee has foreclosed all debate on the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee itself foreclosed debate by deciding that all debate on this section be closed in 30 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. There is another section, is there not?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. It has not yet been reported.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to serve notice that I will be heard somehow or other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That upon the passage of this act the heads of departments in which are employed persons as defined in section 1 of this act shall issue new appointments at the increased rate of compensation herein provided.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out section 2.

Mr. RUCKER. Of course, I am not seriously expecting that this section will be stricken out, but I want to express the surprise that I have met with here to-day. For the gentleman who has charge of this bill I have a profound respect, both as an individual and as a Representative of his great district. But I am astounded to see the narrow channel into which the gentleman, by reason of the domination of some organization in this country, has been forced.

The title of this bill, let me suggest to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], ought to be amended so that it would read, "A bill to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States who reside in cities." All the employees in whose behalf the gentleman and all of his supporters have addressed themselves reside in cities. They are lucky enough to get hold of a Government job, and the gentleman is strenuous in his devotion to their interests. Gentlemen here talk about the absurdity of men trying to live on small wages—$700 or $800 a year—and yet I tell you that in this broad land of ours brave men, patriotic men, are performing a public service every day for far less money. The gentleman from California denies us the privilege of offering amendments, and by exercising the power which the Committee on Labor gives coerces, in my judgment, the votes of Members here.

Oh, I know the power of organized labor in this country, but I want to say to you that if enough men in this House will vote with me I would see this bill hung up until doomsday before it ever passed this House, unless the gentleman relaxes a little and becomes more generous to men who labor outside of the cities. I am perfectly willing to vote against it, although I came here for it. If I could defeat it, I would vote against it. I would defy the advocates of this bill and every beneficiary of this bill, if I had the power to beat it, until such time as they put their affairs in the hands of men who would be broad enough and compassionate enough to know that in this broad land of ours there are good men and worthy men besides those who live within the corporate limits of cities. But outside of the wine growers in the gentleman's district, there is not a man on earth that can excite his compassion or arouse his interest, it seems, unless he belongs to organized labor and resides in some city. Organized labor and organized whisky rings, it seems, have exerted wonderful influence in the last few days, but thank God at least the influence of the liquor forces is growing less and less.

But, Mr. Chairman, I think this Congress to-day is perpetrating a tragedy upon the rights of the people of this Nation. We have appealed all along the line and asked for fair wages for men who perform public service, asked for half wages, asked for a mere pittance, and every time we have appealed for a man who is not blessed with a city residence we find the gentleman from California rising in his place and making points of order or waving his magic wand and controlling the voices of free men. As far as I am concerned, I am getting tired of this spectacle, and I am not going to yield obedience to the humor of committees because of the strength they have, or are supposed to have, in the enforcement of their views.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], my good friend, as usual when he can not have his own way, gets a little bit peeved and makes statements here that are not entirely in accordance with the facts. This bill takes care of all Federal employees employed by the Government of the United States in the cities, towns, and villages; every public building in this country; every lock and dam; all post-office employees, large and small, no matter where; those in the Life-Saving Service, those out in the Forestry Service, and those out in the Indian Service. Employees in every branch of the Government are taken care of under the provisions of this bill.

Now, I helped as much as I could. I recollect the gentleman from Alabama offering his amendment increasing the salaries of rural carriers from 15 to 20 per cent. I have always been consistent in trying to help them, I do not care whether it is a small country postmaster or who it is; but in all fairness I want to say, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] that you can not legislate without knowing something about the results of such legislation; you can not safely put on amendments of this character that affect third or fourth class postmasters and others.

Now, I think that the discussion here this afternoon should be beneficial to this class of men who have been under discussion. I think they are entitled to consideration. I am willing to give them all kinds of consideration; but in considering this bill—I have before me the book of hearings on it, 425 or 430 pages—we did not go into the question of salaries of postmasters, because we did not consider that that question was within the jurisdiction of our committee. The gentleman speaks of the Committee on Labor as an arbitrary committee. That committee have not had very much opportunity to become arbitrary. The gentleman speaks of my magic wand. I do not know that I exercise any magic wand; but I know this, that this bill was under consideration in the last Congress, and our good friend from Missouri supported it.

Mr. WINGO. How does the gentleman maintain his consistency when he says this bill applies to clerks in post offices, and yet he says the committee have no jurisdiction to consider the salaries of postmasters?

Mr. NOLAN. It applies to employees in post offices—elevator men and firemen, and so forth——

Mr. WINGO. In other words, it proposes to take care of one class of employees in the post office and to exclude another class?

Mr. NOLAN. The amendment to exclude this class of postal employees was put in on the floor of the House during the consideration of the bill in September last, in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; but at the time I understood it was defeated.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman voted for the bill.

Mr. WINGO. I certainly would not have voted in favor of discriminating against one class of employees and in favor of another class of employees.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman had an opportunity to defeat that amendment when he was in the House at that time. As I said before, that exception in this bill is simply following the words which were put in on the floor of the House in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. WINGO. No; my vote alone was insufficient.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I very much dislike to butt in on the proceedings on this amendment, but I want to have a word to say about the amendment as soon as I get through with a little more Post Office Committee history.

As the committee will recall, a few moments ago there was a controversy between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and myself about the action of the Post Office Committee. Afterwards I read the RECORD, to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made no objection, and there seemed to be no further difference between us; but the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] came back and took up the cudgel, and he seemed to be laboring under the impression that I was trying to mislead the House. He said, reading from his remarks as reported by the Official Reporter:

> But the gentleman from Oklahoma overlooked the fact that the Post Office Committee previous to that time had reported a bill in the Sixty-fifth Congress which did increase the allowance for clerks in third-class post offices by 50 per cent. I have that law before me and will read it.

Then the gentleman proceeded to read, not the bill reported by the Post Office Committee at all but the Post Office appropriation act passed some four months subsequent to the passage of the salary-increase bill. Furthermore the RECORD shows that those increases were not recommended by the committee, were not even made by the House, but were made at the other end of the Capitol by the Senate. Now, I have before me the act——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask a question right there.

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman stated when he was on the floor before that the increase in compensation was made on his motion on the floor of the House. Now he says it was made in the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. It was made on my motion on the floor of the House in the legislative bill which carried the increased compensation, but again I say to the gentleman that when that bill went to the Senate it was pigeonholed. That bill never became a law as the gentleman from Illinois himself well knows. As I recall, it was not even considered by the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. After burying this salary-increase bill the Senate attached certain increases to the Post Office appropriation bill, and that is the thing to which the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] referred. He was reading from that act, the very act which I have just quoted, when he said I overlooked calling attention to the act. So the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] now comes in and presents, not a bill reported by the Post Office Committee of the House at all, but an act that was passed by Congress. The bills I hold in my hand are the bills reported by the committee and passed by the House, and neither contains any of the figures given by the gentleman from California but contains even less than he said the law authorized to be paid to clerks of third-class post offices at that time, and I will read in order that there may be no mistake. The gentleman from California said:

> In the law of 1918 that allowance was $350, and we increased it 50 per cent.

Here is what the law says:

> No allowance in excess of $300 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,100 or $1,200.

That is the bill as it passed the House on June 29, legislative day of June 27, 1918.

So the gentleman from California himself was mistaken when he read the law and took it for granted, I presume, that the gentleman from Oklahoma was an easy mark and would not attempt to reply and straighten him out. None of us are always right, and I myself am right so seldom that when I do happen to be right I want the House to understand that I am right, and do not want a man to contradict it who is wrong and does not know what he is talking about. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman from California further said when I interrupted him——

Mr. NOLAN. I serve notice that I will object to any further extension or any discussion except on the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Now, I read further from the remarks of the gentleman a few minutes ago, as reported by the Official Reporter of the House.

> Mr. CARTER. Does the gentleman not know that the increase in the Post Office appropriation bill for allowances for third-class post-office clerks was placed in the bill in the Senate and not in the House?
> Mr. RANDALL of California. No; that increase was put in by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House, and I will read the law.

Certainly he read the law, but he did not read the bill as reported by the Post Office Committee which came to the House and was passed by the House.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I will yield, only do not take up too much of my time.

Mr. RANDALL of California. I will ask the gentleman to read from the report of the House Post Office Committee on this paragraph. Will the gentleman read it?

Mr. CARTER. What on earth has the report of the Post Office Committee to do with it? I am not talking about what the gentleman says in the report. I am talking about what he and his committee does in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. No; I will not yield. I want to repeat this to the gentleman from California:

I am not talking about what he said he put in the report. I am talking of what is in the bill. What was said in the report does not help the poor, underpaid country employee one bit. That is just what I am inveighing against—this camouflaging and pretending to be doing a thing which in reality does not exist. It is always said that something is going to be done for the third and fourth class employees, but when the great Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads brings in the bill you never see them taken care of.

Now, another word, and that is that the bill which the gentleman from California refers to is the Post Office appropriation act and was passed on June 27, 1918. The legislative bill to which the increase was made on the amendment I proposed passed this House in March, 1918, some three months prior to the time of the appropriation act presented here, and the gentleman stated that the appropriation act in question passed the House first, when it was really not in existence when the legislative bill was considered by the House.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the wording of section 2, which has been read, and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from California, as I want some information. Section 2 reads:

> That upon the passage of this act the heads of departments in which are employed persons as defined in section 1 of this act shall issue new appointments at the increased rate of compensation herein provided.

If this is passed as written, will it not give the head of every department the right to appoint new men to these positions and put out the men now employed?

Mr. NOLAN. I do not think that is so, absolutely not.

Mr. RUBEY. I do not think there is any question but that they will have authority under the provisions of this act as written to make new appointments and to appoint anybody they please, provided, of course, they come under the civil service.

Mr. NOLAN. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. RUBEY. Can the gentleman tell just what it does mean, whom are they going to appoint?

Mr. NOLAN. The men now in the positions.

Mr. RUBEY. Why not say so and make it absolutely certain.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, they will all be good Democrats.

Mr. NOLAN. The language in this section passed the lawyers on the committee. I am not a lawyer.

Mr. RUBEY. Neither am I. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in the little time I have remaining that I intended to support this bill. I expect to support the bill on final passage, unless something happens after this committee rises. We adopted here the other day the Good amendment, which is an amendment that ought to stay in the bill. I say here and now, if that amendment is voted down in the House I shall not support the bill on final passage. I am in favor of giving them $3 a day, I am in favor of giving them $90 a month, I am in favor of giving them $1,080 a year; but I am not in favor of paying them $3.80 a day, I am not in favor of giving them $110 a month, and I am not in favor of giving them $1,320 a year.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman, the trouble with the gentleman from Oklahoma is that he is behind the times. He refers to the act passed more than a year ago. I am referring to the act passed in the last Congress, and I have here the language of the act as it passed the House and as it passed the Senate. As it passed the House it contained an increase of clerk hire of 50 per cent for third-class post offices, and I submit it to the gentleman from Oklahoma for confirmation. I will read from the report of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in which the statement is made—

> There is an increase, as shown in the bill, in the salaries of fourth-class postmasters and a 50 per cent increase in the appropriation to cover the cost of clerical service in post offices of the third class.

Mr. CARTER. What was the date of the passage of this; December 8, 1918?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 2, line 18, after the word "appointment," insert the words "to such persons."

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, this is the last section of the bill. In a few moments the gentleman in charge of the bill will move that the committee rise, and with it will die the efforts that have been made to do justice to all Federal employees and not "certain" of them, as the title of the bill reads. The title of the bill is to fix the compensation of "certain" employees of the United States. I, for one, have grown sick and tired of Congress picking out one particular class of employees and raising their salaries or wages and ignoring all others. To-day effort after effort was made by members of the Democratic side of the House to do justice to the other employees of the Government, the great majority of whom reside in the rural districts of the South and West.

Time after time when such amendments were offered the Republicans, with their overwhelming majority, voted them down. At no time did more than three Republicans rise to support amendments to this bill to do justice to this underpaid class of Federal employees in the South and the West. Only three Republicans voted to give fourth-class postmasters a minimum of $1 a day. I want to say to my western Republican friends that they need not be surprised. You will get the same kind of treatment by the organization of your party in this House on every other occasion that comes up under the present dominant power of the Republican Party. You went out into the West in the last campaign and you raised the hue and cry that the South was in the saddle, but you will have to go back to your people and explain to them why it is that the West, and especially the rural people of the West, can get nothing out of this Republican Congress. The only explanation that you can make will be that under the Republican rule Massachusetts and New York and Pennsylvania are in the saddle.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. No. Let us take the committees of Congress. The Republican Party has placed on the important committees in this House, in more than one case at least, two Republicans from Pennsylvania, and frequently has ignored the entire West, and given them practically no representation upon the committee. That is the reason why to-day, when Members on the Democratic side try to do justice to the rural postmasters of the West only three Republicans rise to assist them. [Applause on Democratic side.] You are going to get worse than that. Pennsylvania and New York and Massachusetts dominate the Republican Party and treat with contempt the farmers of the mid-West and West.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking about anything in the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MADDEN. I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I can understand how an Illinois Republican, in view of the way Illinois has been outraged by the Republican organization in this House, does not like that subject discussed. Illinois Republicans can hope for nothing at the hands of their party.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, is the Chairman going to pay any attention to the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is out of order, and he will confine himself to his amendment.

Mr. WINGO. All right, Mr. Chairman. I am calling the attention of the western Members to a certain amendment in this bill——

Mr. MADDEN. What is the amendment before the committee?

Mr. WINGO. The amendment before the committee is to insert the words "to such persons," and I am talking about such persons. [Laughter and applause on Democratic side.] I am talking about Republican postmasters in the hamlets of Illinois for whom the gentleman refused to vote for an adequate wage.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Arkansas had a chance in the last Congress to do that, and why did he not do it?

Mr. WINGO. I did try to do it, but the gentleman fought every effort, as did the leaders of the Republican Party in the last Congress, and to-day he and they line up solidly against the fourth-class postmasters. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. CANNON: Strike out section 2 of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to read section 2. It is as follows:

> SEC. 2. That upon the passage of this act the heads of departments in which are employed persons as defined in section 1 of this act shall issue new appointments at the increased rate of compensation herein provided.

I do not believe for the purpose of this bill that section is necessary. Why should there be appointments by wholesale and by legislation? I should be very glad to be interrupted if anyone can give me a reason for it.

Mr. NOLAN. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that as the committee understood it, with a practical reclassification in the way of a minimum-wage bill, it is necessary to direct some authority to the heads of departments to issue new appointments at the increased compensation.

Mr. CANNON. But the bill increases the compensation.

Mr. NOLAN. It can not affect the persons employed.

Mr. CANNON. Why not?

Mr. NOLAN. It does not authorize any new appointments, because practically every one of these employees is a statutory employee or else provided for under a lump sum.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does not the bill automatically increase the salaries without any new commissions or appointments?

Mr. CANNON. It is just like a bonus. Every employee who is getting less than $3 a day, who comes under this bill, will get his $3 a day or whatever the bill provides for. Three dollars a day may abide permanently in the law or it may not. There may be people who ought not to be reappointed. I do not know. Why should you compel by a provision of the law that the Executive shall reappoint every man or woman who is covered by the bill? You may say that the bill means nothing; that you take from the President or the heads of the departments, as the case may be, the power to make appointments. I have no doubt that there are some people who ought not to be reappointed.

Seeing no necessity for this section, I move to strike it out. You may just as well provide that all this army of people who get the bonus by prior or war-time legislation shall be reappointed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Might not this condition arise: In order to effect economies in the department occasioned by this increase, if the department wanted to dismiss some useless employees, it could not do it? They would have to be recommissioned.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; they must be reappointed. I doubt the constitutionality of the provision. I shall not discuss it from that standpoint. So far as I am concerned, I shall vote to strike out section 2, and I am friendly to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. NOLAN) there were—ayes 86, noes 75.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the announcement.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes were 86 and the noes were 75, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5726, had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. NOLAN. I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks for a separate vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. Is there any other amendment——

Mr. BLANTON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. It is not time yet to demand the yeas and nays. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the question on the other amendments in gross.

The question was taken, and the other amendments were agreed to.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on the Good amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks for the yeas and nays on the Good amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Let us have the amendment reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 2, line 7, after the word "clerks," add the following:

"Provided further, That the additional compensation granted to certain Government employees under section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved March 1, 1919, shall be computed as a part of the total compensation of such employees in determining their rights to the benefit of the minimum compensation herein authorized."

The SPEAKER. On that the gentleman from California demands the yeas and nays. Evidently a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 282, answered "present" 2, not voting 55, as follows:

Mr. BLACKMON. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN. I desire to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I find I am paired with the Democratic whip, Mr. BELL, and I desire to withdraw my vote of "nay" and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I request a reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. To make a parliamentary inquiry. I understand if the engrossed copy of the bill is not read that that will kill the bill. Will it not?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no. The bill waits until it is engrossed.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address of my colleague, Mr. ELLSWORTH, at the funeral of the late Carl C. Van Dyke.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by his colleague, Mr. ELLSWORTH, at the funeral of late Representative Van Dyke. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK. A motion to recommit this bill will be in order after the engrossed bill is read, will it not?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NOLAN. When the engrossed bill comes in in the morning, will the matter be automatically laid before the House as unfinished business and continuing order?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order at any time after the special order is disposed of, unless some other special order takes its place. It can not displace a special order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the final determination of this bill would have to wait until a final vote was had on the so-called prohibition bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes. Has the Committee on Labor any further business for the consideration of the House?

Mr. NOLAN. The Committee on Labor has no further bills.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are two special orders now pending in the House, both of them brought in under a special rule. If this matter is not disposed of to-day, do I understand the Chair to say that it would not interfere with either of the special orders pending?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. KAHN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. This is Calendar Wednesday, of course, and the call of committees will proceed, I presume. The next committee, as I understand it, is the Committee on Patents. That committee has some business on the calendar. If that committee were to proceed, and the engrossed copy of the Nolan bill could be brought back here before we adjourn for Calendar Wednesday, would it be possible to get a vote on it this evening?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How did the Speaker decide the question as to whether this bill be voted on to-morrow or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided it could not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. At no time to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. No; except by unanimous consent. There is a special order which takes precedence of this bill.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 5 o'clock.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 5 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. RUCKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to see this business disposed of, so that we can dispose of the sundry civil bill, so as to provide for the soldiers who want treatment. The gentleman ought not to delay in that way.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the calling of committees. The Chair understands that the Committee on Labor has no further business?

Mr. NOLAN. No.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Patents.

AMENDMENT OF THE COPYRIGHT ACT.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 3754.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California, from the Committee on Patents, calls up the bill H. R. 3754, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3754) to amend sections 8 and 21 of the copyright act, approved March 4, 1909.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 8 and 21 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That the author or proprietor of any work made the subject of copyright by this act, or his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall have copyright for such work under the conditions and for the terms specified in this act: Provided, however, That the copyright secured by this act shall extend to the work of an author or proprietor who is a citizen or subject of a foreign State or nation only:

"(a) When an alien author or proprietor shall be domiciled within the United States at the time of the first publication of his work; or

"(b) When the foreign State or nation of which such author or proprietor is a citizen or subject grants, either by treaty, convention, agreement, or law, to citizens of the United States the benefit of copyright on substantially the same basis as to its own citizens, or copyright protection substantially equal to the protection secured to such foreign author under this act or by treaty; or when such foreign State or nation is a party to an international agreement which provides for reciprocity in the granting of copyright, by the terms of which agreement the United States may, at its pleasure, become a party thereto.

"The existence of the reciprocal conditions aforesaid shall be determined by the President of the United States, by proclamation made from time to time, as the purposes of this act may require: Provided, however, That all works made the subject of copyright by the laws of the United States first produced or published abroad after August 1, 1914, and before the date of the President's proclamation of peace, of which the authors or proprietors are citizens or subjects of any foreign State or nation granting similar protection for works by citizens of the United States, the existence of which shall be determined by a copyright proclamation issued by the President of the United States, shall be entitled to the protection conferred by the copyright laws of the United States from and after the accomplishment, before the expiration of 15 months after the date of the President's proclamation of peace, of the conditions and formalities prescribed with respect to such works by the copyright laws of the United States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any person of any right which he may have acquired by the republication of such foreign work in the United States prior to the approval of this act.

"SEC. 21. That in the case of a book published abroad in the English language on or after the date of the President's proclamation of peace, the deposit in the Copyright Office, not later than 60 days after its publication abroad, of one complete copy of the foreign edition, with a request for the reservation of the copyright and a statement of the name and nationality of the author and of the copyright proprietor and of the date of publication of the said book, shall secure to the author or proprietor an ad interim copyright, which shall have all the force and effect given to copyright by this act, and shall endure until the expiration of four months after such deposit in the Copyright Office."

JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 120. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive, for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, Tao Hung Chang and Zeng Tze Wong, citizens of China; and

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF THE COPYRIGHT ACT.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 3754 is a bill to amend sections 8 and 21 of the copyright act, approved March 4, 1909. A similar bill was reported out in the closing hours of the Sixty-fifth Congress, but failed of consideration in the House, due to the congestion of the Calendar.

This bill has the indorsement of the Librarian of Congress and of Mr. Solberg, the Register of Copyrights. It also has the indorsement of the Authors' League of America, and there has been nobody who has appeared before our committee, either personally or through communication, who has opposed the measure. I might give the statement of Mr. Solberg, who probably is more familiar with the copyright law than anybody else connected with the Government. He is the Register of Copyrights in the Library of Congress.

Mr. Solberg states that the proposed amendment to the copyright act, approved March 4, 1909, is necessary in order to accomplish two separate and distinct things. The first change is in section 8, which provides for copyrights in the United States on works by authors who are citizens or subjects of foreign countries, and is for the purpose of securing protection in the United States for works published abroad during the war. The copyright act grants protection in the United States upon certain conditions. To secure valid protection these conditions must be fully and exactly complied with, but owing to the war it was found to be impossible to comply with the prescribed conditions, with the result that only a small percentage of the foreign books and other works issued abroad during the war have secured copyright in the United States, and a large proportion of American books published since August 1, 1914, have failed to secure public protection abroad.

The real intent and purpose of this legislation is to give the authors in this country an opportunity to have copyrighted in foreign countries, especially those that were our allies during the war, the works and books that they published during the war. Due to the limited amount of time permitted under the present copyright laws and our reciprocal relations with other countries, it was impossible for foreign authors in friendly and neutral countries to get their works to America in time to be copyrighted. The same conditions prevailed regarding the works of our own authors and publishers. In the trading-with-the-enemy act we give greater consideration to the countries with which we were at war than we do in the present copyright law to those who were neutral during the war and those that we were allies with.

It is therefore proposed in this bill to amend section 8 so as to secure retrospective protection in the United States for such works as have been first produced or published abroad since August 1, 1914, by providing in the case of such works that the conditions and the formalities prescribed with respect to such works by the copyright statutes of the United States may be complied with within a period of 15 months after the date of the proclamation of the President's proclamation of peace.

These conditions, briefly enumerated, are the deposit of copies for registration, the filing of applications for recording the claims of copyright, the payment of the registration fee, $1, and in the case of books in the English language, that the copy shall have been reprinted and rebound within the limits of the United States.

It does not repeal or amend any of the manufacturing sections of the present copyright law. If they are artistic works, such as photo-engravings and lithographs, that they shall have been reproduced by lithographic or photographic processes wholly performed within the limits of the United States.

It is provided in the bill that only those foreign works shall be considered which are by authors who are citizens or subjects of a foreign state or nation which grants similar protection for works by citizens of the United States, and it is provided that the existence of such protection in behalf of American authors in any foreign country or countries shall be determined by a copyright proclamation issued by the President. The countries chiefly concerned are Great Britain and the British Dominions, France, Spain, Italy, Belgium, and the Scandinavian countries.

To safeguard any American producers who may have secured any rights or privileges by prior republication of works published abroad during the war, the bill contains the following proviso:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any person of any right which he may have acquired by the republication of such foreign work in the United States prior to the approval of this act.

Diplomatic correspondence between our Government and Great Britain has led to a proposal for reciprocal, retrospective protection in Great Britain for a period equal in length to our term of copyright protection, upon the single condition that actual—not colorable—publication of the American author's work shall take place in England during the proposed period of 15 months after the date of the President's proclamation of peace, and that the necessary deposit of copies shall be made after such publication in England. The legislation on copyright in Great Britain does not require the manufacture of the book there, protection is secured by merely publishing the work; that is, placing it on sale first or simultaneously with publication of the book elsewhere.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have just been able to obtain a copy of the bill which the gentleman is explaining, and I should like to ask whether it contemplates a new order with regard to the issuing of copyrights to aliens.

Mr. NOLAN. No; it provides that in case any country shall give reciprocal protection we shall give the citizens of that country the benefit of copyrighting works and books produced during the war. Wherever we get reciprocal protection of that kind we ourselves, through proclamation of the President, give them the same rights in this country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman what support this bill has and where that support comes from?

Mr. NOLAN. The bill is vouched for by Mr. Solberg, register of the Copyright Division of the Library of Congress. It is also approved by the Authors' League of America, who also represent the Incorporated Society of Authors, Playwrights, and Composers, and the American Publishers' Copyright League.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does it contemplate any new privileges or protection to alien authors not provided by existing law?

Mr. NOLAN. No; only that it takes care of a situation that arose during the war. Authors in foreign countries had to get their works to this country within a certain specified time. The book had to be manufactured and printed, and during the war they were unable to do that. This extends that time within which that can be done and gives them the right to copyright the works that were produced during the war, provided they give our authors and publishers similar protection in their own country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It provides, on page 2, line 15—

The existence of the reciprocal conditions aforesaid shall be determined by the President of the United States by proclamation made from time to time as the purposes of this act may require.

Is that provision inserted by reason of anything that has happened during the peace negotiations at Paris?

Mr. NOLAN. I could not say as to that. I do not believe it is.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to call attention to the fact that the law as it stands to-day contains that. The amendment is in the proviso.

Mr. NOLAN. The Acting Secretary of State transmitted to the Committee on Patents June 24, 1919, a letter giving specific reasons why the State Department or the Government desires this legislation passed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there anything which the United States Congress is asked to grant to alien authors in this bill that would not be granted to American authors in any foreign country?

Mr. NOLAN. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is wholly a reciprocal proposition?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes. The books that our authors write and publish can be published abroad and get protection, and they can come in here and get the protection that they would receive under the copyright law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman gone into it sufficiently to say if there is anything in the extension of the law which would give a foreign author any privilege in the United States which the American author would not have in foreign countries?

Mr. NOLAN. No; and that is the object of the bill. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been informed that it will be impossible for the minimum-wage bill to be engrossed this afternoon.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information. Line 16, page 3, requires the foreign author to furnish one complete copy. Unless we have changed the law, and I was not paying any attention to it, the American author is compelled to file two copies. Why should they be allowed to file only one and the American author be compelled to file two?

Mr. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that that is a new provision. They not only have to file that but under the manufacturers' law, the copyright law, they must have it published and printed in this country. They not only have to file a copy of a foreign publication but they have to have the book that is published and circulated in this country printed and manufactured in this country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does that compel them to file two copies?

Mr. NOLAN. They have to file one copy printed in the foreign country, and in addition they have to file under the manufacturers' law additional copies in the copyright office.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Section 21 provides for books published abroad in the English language. Why does not the bill refer to books in the Spanish, the French, or any other language?

Mr. NOLAN. That is where they bring in the foreign edition; they must file a copyright in addition to the book in the English language.

Mr. JUUL. They must have the book translated and file the translation?

Mr. NOLAN. As a general proposition the books are all printed in the English language. This bill is introduced at the request of the Publishers' and Authors' League. The secretary of the Authors' League was present and represented the incorporated Society of the Authors, Playwrights, and Composers, and the American Publishers' Cooperative League.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the uncreated, self-existing God, the source of wisdom and of power, we come to Thee making our humble supplication that we may be fitted for the duties of life. As we face the tremendous problems resting upon us we feel to pray with Thy servant of the ancient day, "if Thy spirit go not with us send us not up hence." Send us forth in the discharge of our duties with Thy spirit guiding us, that we shall meet them as men and accomplish the divine purpose and will in us. Bless us to-day, we pray Thee. For Christ's sake. Amen.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1919.

Resolutions protesting against the attitude of the United States Shipping Board toward the port of Boston.

Whereas the port of Boston is the business center of the woolen, worsted, cotton, boot and shoe industries of America, with unsurpassed harbor and terminal facilities, and the advantage of being nearer foreign markets than other American ports; and

Whereas the United States Shipping Board is allocating a greater number of vessels and a larger amount of tonnage to ports less favored than the port of Boston: Be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby protest that the present policy of the United States Shipping Board is unwarranted and unfair in its failure to recognize the importance of the New England industries and the opportunity offered in the use of Boston Harbor for aiding in the development of foreign commerce at this critical time and in extending the use of American manufactures in foreign countries;

Resolved, That immediate steps should be taken by the United States Shipping Board to revise its policy so that a sufficient number of ships may be made available immediately for the development of the port of Boston; and

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the United States Shipping Board, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

In house of representatives adopted July 2, 1919.

SHANTUNG PENINSULA, CHINA.

Mr. SPENCER. I submit a resolution and ask to have it read and referred to the Commitee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 125) was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its deep regret at the provisions of the treaty (secs. 156, 157, 158) which transfers to Japan such broad rights and powers and physical possession over the territory and people in the Shantung Peninsula of China, as being alike disregardful of the true rights and deep-seated desires of the more than 36,000,000 of Chinese inhabiting the peninsula, unjust to the Republic of China, and threatening to the future peace of the world.

It is the sincere hope of the United States that this manifest injustice may be speedily reconsidered and remedied.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I ask, if there be no objection, to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Grand Rapids Herald, of Michigan, including a letter from Mr. Taft, regarding reservations upon the league of nations. It seems to me it will be very helpful at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A SAFE AMERICAN PROGRAM FOR THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

(By A. H. Vandenberg, the editor, the Herald.)

Based on a communication received by the Herald yesterday from ex-President William Howard Taft, the Herald believes that Mr. Taft (who, next to President Wilson himself, is the chief American advocate of the league of nations) has come into substantial consent to the Herald's long-preached program for an acceptance of the treaty of peace and a ratification of the league covenant with reservations which shall distinctly make the league safe for the United States.

If this is correct, it should show Washington the way to a speedy and harmonious program of action—acceptable alike in the White House and in the Capitol (if these two citadels be ruled by reason): A program of action which will produce immediate ratification of the treaty and the league covenant, yet which will save American independence, the American Constitution, and American autonomy.

It will be remembered that when Mr. Taft came to Grand Rapids several weeks ago under the auspices of his League to Enforce Peace to plead for the league of nations covenant, the Herald presented him with a questionnaire. In this inquiry, the Herald sought to secure his interpretation upon several muddy sections of the covenant, vitally affecting the destiny of this free nation; and, in addition, begged him to consent to Senate reservations which should officially tell the world that America will always insist upon just such interpretations as he (and other proponents like him) declares, unofficially, to be appropriate. (In each of these important instances, the covenant can be construed two diametrically opposite ways; one way, safe for the United States; the other way, absolutely subvertive of perpetuated independent American Government.)

Mr. Taft did not reply, extemporaneously, in his Coliseum speech that evening. But two days later he favored the Herald with a long and well-sustained communication in which he partially consented that two of the "reservations," which the Herald has urged, would not be inappropriate, provided they did not reopen the entire league problem to renewed international negotiations. At the same time he courteously promised the Herald further investigation into the points we raised.

Yesterday's mail brought a further communication from this eminent statesman. "I send you a suggested series of resolutions," he writes, "which might easily be transformed into reservations." And these are the "resolutions":

"Whereas under article 10 of the covenant, the members undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league, and in case of such aggression or in case of any danger or threat of such aggression, the council is to advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled; and

"Whereas the preservation of the territorial integrity and the existing political independence of members may require, and the council may advise, the employment of force: Now, therefore, it is

"Resolved, That nothing contained in this treaty or in article 10 thereof is to be so construed as to require the United States of America to employ or to be called upon by the members of the league to employ military force for the purpose of fulfilling any obligation under article 10 until the Congress of the United States shall have passed appropriate legislation pursuant to the powers reserved to it under Article I of the Constitution of the United States with reference thereto.

"Resolved, That the power to declare and maintain war is vested in the Congress of the United States, and if the performance by the United States Government of the obligation assumed by article 10 of the covenant at any time requires the exercise of such power, supplementary action by Congress will become necessary.

"Resolved further, That in any approval of the treaty of peace a reservation by resolution should be made that the covenant of the league of nations as now drafted is not to be interpreted—

"(a) As affecting or bringing within the jurisdiction of the league the traditional national policy of the United States known as the 'Monroe doctrine,' as it has been from time to time asserted and whereby for its own defense this Nation has regarded as an unfriendly act any attempt by foreign nations, whether by war or purchase or diplomatic intrigue, to make territorial acquisitions or to secure new strategical footholds upon or near the Western Hemisphere or to secure political advantage in the domestic affairs of American nations; or

"(b) As affecting or bringing under the jurisdiction of the league such domestic matters as the admission of immigrants to this country, the regulation of commerce, including coastwise trade and transportation, or the fiscal policy, including tariff laws."

If such reservations as these meet with Mr. Taft's approval, Mr. Taft and the Herald are at last in concert regarding the proper action which should be taken by the United States Senate. Everything that has happened since we first insisted upon this view has strengthened the Herald's conviction that it was advocating the right course—for the sake of America as well as for the sake of the world; and, certainly, nothing could more completely confirm this conviction than to win Mr. Taft's approval.

If to the reservations above outlined there be added one further clause, making it clear that America will always construe the right of withdrawal on two years' notice as being an affirmative right which cannot be vitiated by any league strictures, based upon alleged misconduct during those "two years" through which the "notice" must run, we believe a solid, substantial, patriotic, safe, sane course has been charted which will readily command a heavy Senate majority and which will be entitled to the whole-hearted indorsement of the people of the United States.

Advocates of the league insist (and will continue to insist) that the league covenant is "safe for the United States," because, say they, it does mean just what these reservations say it means. How, then, can they hope to successfully argue against permitting the Senate to say so officially, concurrent with its act of ratification? Evidently Mr. Taft does not intend to be in that dubious posture.

If the covenant does not mean what these reservations declare and what these sled-length proponents declare, then the league is not safe for the United States and should not be accepted, no matter what the pressure from the seats of the mighty. If the covenant does not mean these things, then it does mean that our children may be called to fight the foreign wars of all the world without any right of independent American decision as required by our Constitution; and it does mean that we are transferring sovereign authority over our own immigration laws and our own tariffs and our own Monroe doctrine to an Old World from which we have been successfully independent for 143 years.

It would be suicidal negligence to ratify the covenant without making these moot points clear, without protecting ourselves while we are yet free agents in the world. On the other hand, with these reservations declared, it would be rank provincialism not to participate in the league experiment for the sake of the great peace good it may be made to accomplish within its legitimate sphere.

And who, pray, will object?

Britain can not complain if we are at least partially as jealous of our rights as she has been of hers. She signed no covenant until her supremacy of the seas had been saved for all time and until her league influence had been beautifully safeguarded. Japan can not complain. She got Shantung, answering her particular national ideal, before she yielded to the call of the dotted line. France can not complain. She obtained, with Mr. Wilson's consent, the greatest "reservation" of all when she negotiated a supplementary alliance under which we are called upon to refight her battles along the German Rhine in case the league does not function satisfactorily. As a matter of fact, no foreign nation can object, (1) because the Old World can not have a league without us, and it wants us at any price to help carry its load; (2) because to "object" to such reservations as these would be to openly confess that there is a foreign intention ultimately to interpret the league against us and our independence and our autonomy.

If no one can object outside of the United States, why, in Heaven's name, should anyone inside the United States, from President Wilson down, object, when the sole and only purpose is to preserve America and make clear to the world that we are not abrogating any of our intentions to preserve America?

REPORT ON SITUATION IN KOREA.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD the report of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America on the Korean atrocities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FOREWORD.

IMPORTANT CABLE MESSAGES.

Just as this pamphlet was about to go to press the following cable message was received from Hon. T. Hara, premier of the Japanese cabinet:

"I desire to assure you that the report of abuses committed by agents of the Japanese Government in Korea has been engaging my most serious attention. I am fully prepared to look squarely at actual facts. As I have declared on various occasions, the régime of administration inaugurated in Korea at the time of the annexation, nearly 10 years ago, calls for substantial modification to meet the altered conditions of things. Ever since the formation of the present cabinet in September last I have been occupied in working out the scheme of needed administrative reforms in Korea. A comprehensive plan of reorganization with this object in view has already been on the tapis. For obvious reasons it has not been possible to proceed at once to its formal adoption in the presence of the disturbances which have unfortunately broken out in various parts of the peninsula.

"In view, however, of the recent improvement in the situation, the contemplated reform can now be, in my estimation, safely introduced, and will be carried into effect as soon as the legal requirements of procedure to make them definitive shall have been completed. Announcement of the plan in a more complete form shall be withheld for the present, but I trust that the fixed determination with which my colleagues and I have been endeavoring to promote the lasting welfare of our Korean kinsmen and to insure a distinct betterment of conditions in the country will not be misunderstood or misconstrued."

The foregoing cablegram was received July 10, and came in answer to a cable sent him June 26, 1919, by the Commission on Relations with the Orient, as follows:

"Agitation regarding Chosen abuses increasingly serious, endangering good will. Can not withhold facts. Urgently important you publish official statements that abuses have ceased and reasonable administrative reforms proceeding. Can you cable to this effect? Address Fedcil—Commission Relations Orient, Federal Council Churches."

At an earlier date, namely, April 20, a cablegram regarding the Korean situation had been sent by Consul General Yada to Viscount Uchida, Minister of Foreign Affairs in Tokyo. In reply to that cablegram, the following message was received by Mr. Yada and handed to this commission on May 15, 1919:

* * * * * * *

"Premier Hara has for some time past been most deeply concerned in regard to the introduction of reforms into the governmental administration of Chosen. He is now in the midst of special investigations as to the best methods for the realization of these reforms, which might be seriously interfered with and made more difficult were the press of foreign countries rashly at this time to incite additional excitement.

"Therefore you are instructed to explain the situation as above stated to the members of the Federal Council Commission, conveying to them at the same time the appreciation on my part of their cordial and friendly spirit which has prompted them to take action in this present trouble. It is also the desire of the premier that you should call their attention more especially to the gravity of the whole affair if it is not handled in a proper way and ask for the continuance of their sane and moderate attitude."

* * * * * * *

These cable messages indicate the earnestness with which this commission, the Consul General Yada, and the Premier of Japan himself have been acting in response to the appeals that have come from Korea.

There is every reason to believe that Premier Hara and his colleagues will exert their fullest power to rectify the wrongs and inaugurate a new era in Korea.

THE JAPAN-KOREAN SITUATION.

Early in March telegraphic news from Shanghai and Tientsin began to tell of a remarkable uprising for independence in Korea, which, it was alleged, the Japanese Government was suppressing with great brutality. In April letters began to arrive verifying the telegraphic news, and giving considerable detail. These letters and reports came through many indirect channels in order to escape a rigid censorship and were addressed to the secretaries of foreign mission boards having missions in Korea. Copies of letters from missionaries to friends and kindred in America were also forwarded by them to these board secretaries.

All appealed for some action in America that would save the Koreans from the brutal and inhuman treatment to which they were being ruthlessly subjected.

About the middle of April the first person who came direct from Korea, bringing personal knowledge of the situation, and arriving in New York, was Rev. A. E. Armstrong, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church of Canada. He had spent 10 months in the Far East, visiting the stations of his board in China, Manchuria, Korea, and Japan, and was on the point of sailing from Yokohama for America, when he received a wire urging an immediate revisit to Korea. He reached Seoul March 16, was there for three days in consultation with various parties, getting full and accurate information.

On reaching New York he at once consulted Dr. Arthur J. Brown, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church of the United States; Dr. Frank Mason North, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States; and Dr. William I. Haven, secretary of the American Bible Society. The subject matter to be dealt with was of such a nature that they thought it could best be handled by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America rather than by the mission boards.

A meeting was therefore called of the Commission on Relations with the Orient of the Federal Council of Churches on April 16. Since that date the commission has held a dozen meetings in connection with this question not only to study it but also to take such action as might seem wise. To two of the meetings a group of important Japanese in New York City were invited. Urgent and full cablegrams were promptly sent to Japan by some of these Japanese friends.

The commission sought by these quiet and friendly methods to exert influences that would secure real results. It deemed it only fair and just to take up the matter first with the Japanese before giving to the daily press the rapidly accumulating material from Korea. This has been done. The commission now feels that the time has come when the full and accurate information in its possession should be made available for the public.

The documents printed in the following pages the commission believes to be thoroughly reliable. More than 30 American and British individuals in Korea have shared in their preparation. Some of the documents are carefully prepared reports by committees; some are personal letters; some are signed affidavits of eyewitnesses. If all the material in hand were published, a volume of about 1,000 pages would result.

One of the reports covers 114 closely packed pages. In these days of excitement and political turmoil in many lands we must accept with caution extreme statements that are not capable of proof. Many exaggerations have been circulated. The facts described in the following pages speak for themselves.

The commission gives this material to the public for two principal reasons. First, because it wishes that every possible influence may be brought to bear for the protection of Koreans from inhuman treatment and injustice. Second, because there is need of a sound and enlightened public opinion here in America, a public opinion that will strengthen the progressive, antimilitaristic forces in Japan in their efforts to secure justice and fair dealing in Korea.

The commission wishes to state with utmost clearness that as a commission it is not concerning itself with the political questions involved in the Korean independence movement. Whether or not Korea should be granted political independence is not a question upon which it is called to express judgment. The commission is, however, concerned with all right-minded men that brutality, torture, inhuman treatment, religious persecutions, and massacres shall cease everywhere. The evidence of the wide prevalence of such deeds in Korea has become convincing.

In dealing with this situation there is need of an accurately informed and just public opinion, able in its criticism of Japan to discriminate between the reactionary and militaristic forces on the one hand and those that are liberal and progressive on the other hand. Wholesome and fair criticism will recognize the disaster that has come upon the whole world through the spirit and practice of militarism. Japan, too, has been caught in its meshes. But in Japan, too, as in other lands, there is a liberal antimilitaristic movement, led by humane and progressive men, who, we believe, share the distress of mind which their friends in America feel over what is being done in Korea.

The present cabinet, having as premier the first "Commoner" who has risen to that high post of responsibility, though liberal itself, is the heir of the disastrous militaristic policies and methods of preceding cabinets. There is good ground for belief that even before the uprising it was earnestly grappling with the problem of administrative reform in Korea. The turmoil has halted its program. Its political foes, moreover, bureaucratic and militaristic, are many and strong and are watching for any opportunity for causing the downfall of the cabinet.

Americans should give the strongest possible moral support to the progressive and antimilitaristic movements in that land. This we can do, especially in this instance, as just indicated above, not by wholesale condemnation of the Japanese Government and people but by distinguishing between the reactionary, autocratic forces that have too largely dominated her policies and leaders in the past and the new liberal policies and leaders that are now coming to the fore. Hope for Korea, and indeed for China and the whole world, lies in the overthrow of militarism in Japan, as in every land, and in the firm establishment of civil liberty and popular rights for every section of the population.

THE DISTURBANCES IN KOREA.

(By ———.)

MARCH 21, 1919.

Korea at the present time would be a fertile field for another Bryce investigating commission. Because the stirrings of the present age have reached Korea and have aroused her people to demand freedom the Japanese military system has since the 1st of March exhibited all the characteristics of the Prussian machine which was recently smashed in Europe. Many of the atrocities perpetrated in Belgium have been duplicated in Korea. According to one newspaper 6,000 Koreans are now in jails and prisons, and this is probably below the actual number. The movement for more freedom is country wide; its propagandists include Christians, members of the reformed native cult, the Chuntokyo and Buddhists. Students of Government schools are equally involved with those of mission schools. And in the name of "law and order" countless offenses against humanity are daily being committed.

THE JAPANESE COLONIAL SYSTEM.

Japan established a protectorate over Korea in 1908, and in 1910 formally annexed the country. Prior to the annexation the administrative system was chaotic. By stern enforcement the Japanese have introduced quiet and order, have commenced to exploit the natural resources of the country, set up a judiciary, developed the beginning of an educational system, improved communications, and cultivated hygiene. There is no denying the fact that many reforms have been brought about under Japanese auspices. But the methods employed in governing Korea have not won the hearts of the people. The genius of the Japanese people is attracted by systems which are autocratic. Their police system is German to the core, and in their colonial government they have taken the Prussian rather than the British method as their model. The sword is the emblem of authority. Not only is it carried by the military, gendarmerie, and police, but by the civilian members of the civil service. Every male school-teacher wears a sword; in fact, almost everyone who holds a Government office carries a sword as the symbol of his authority. To bolster up the militaristic system a vast system of espionage exists. Consequently there is no freedom of assembly, no free speech, no freedom of the press. And there is no right of petition of grievances with immunity from arrest. Needless to say, there is no participation in self-government. In the law courts it is alleged that a Korean has no chance in a suit with a Japanese. Habeas corpus is unknown. The State has a right to keep a prisoner for two weeks or more before producing him in open court, and if it desires by means of securing extensions of 10 days ad lib. need not produce a prisoner in practice until it desires to do so. The prisoner is not allowed to consult a lawyer or to see his friends. Torture is freely applied, and a man is considered guilty until proved innocent. Neither is the Korean permitted to enjoy many offices of emolument under the Government. There are some Korean police and gendarmes, but there are very few Koreans in other departments of the civil service. Korea is a paradise for the Japanese job hunter. Efforts have been made by Government officials to deprave the youth of Korea. Commercialized prostitution is flourishing and is extending from the capital to the country parts. A manisfesto describing the grievances of the people has been issued by the independence committee. Another grievance which strikes deeply to the heart of the Korean is the determination of the Japanese to drive out the use of the Korean language from the schools. The proclamation which provides that Japanese is to be the sole language of instruction comes into force in 1920. The lesson of Poland and other countries seems to be lost upon the Japanese. Then there seems to be an organized attempt to deprive the Koreans in the southern part of Korea—which is the warmer portion—of their land and to force them to emigrate to Manchuria. Pressure is put upon the Korean landholder or tenant to sell, usually at a disadvantageous price, and he and his family go north to make a new home. Japanese settlers replace the Korean. This policy is fostered by a semiofficial company called the Oriental Development Co., which receives valuable concessions from the Government. A veteran missionary summed up the situation trenchantly the other day in these words: "This that builds railways, constructs roads, promotes education, understands hygiene, is none the less German."

JAPANESE REFORM TENDENCIES.

In a word, the whole system of government throughout the Japanese Empire reflects the German system in this—that the civil arm of the Government is dominated by the military. Last September the bureaucratic ministry of Count Terauchi fell, and was succeeded by that of Mr. Hara. The new ministry was acclaimed by the Japanese press as the first democratic government that Japan has had, and from its acts it would seem to deserve the title. Shortly after the Diet opened one of the new ministers replied to a question inquiring what would be the colonial policy of the new ministry, that the Government realized that they could not continue to rule the colonies by Imperial ordinances, but that new methods were under consideration. The minister could not say when they would go into effect. Later press references seemed to reveal an inner struggle in the Government, the civil element apparently wishing to replace the military government of Korea by a civilian administration, and the militarists opposing any such transformation. At the present moment the militarist element is vociferating in the daily press that it is impossible for Japan to ratify the action of its delegates at the peace conference in regard to the abolition of conscription. This by the way: On March 1, a monster popular demonstration took place in Tokyo demanding manhood suffrage, and the Hara ministry a few days later introduced an electoral reform bill, which has passed the popular house, greatly extending the franchise. It would appear therefore that democracy is slowly gaining in the heart of the Empire, and that there were hopes for a brighter day for the colonies from that end.

THE GENESIS OF THE KOREAN INDEPENDENCE MOVEMENT.

Meanwhile a series of happenings combined to precipitate a crisis in Korea. The first of these was the peace conference and the dissemination of the doctrine of self-determination of races. The following story was told to a representative group of missionaries by the minister of internal affairs of the government general of Chosen.

He stated that the Government had information that a Korean had interviewed President Wilson before he had left for Paris, and asked the President if he would bring up the question of Korea at the conference. The President replied, it is alleged, that the conference could only deal with countries which were affected by the war, and that the question of a country at peace, as Korea was, could not be properly raised. The interviewer then asked whether if it could be unmistakably shown that the Koreans were dissatisfied would the case of Korea then be discussed at the peace conference? To which the President is reported to have said that in that case he would not say that it could not be. According to information from other sources it seems that this is quite a likely story. There are many Koreans in the Western States, in Hawaii, Siberia, and China, and throughout all the centers of Korean population the movement for independence rapidly spread.

The proceedings of the peace conference formed another link in the chain of events. The league of nations, the gospel of the right of small nations to self-determination, the reviving of oppressed nations set free by the war, all fired the imagination of the educated Koreans.

Then an event nearer home occurred to bring out national feeling. On January 20 the ex-Emperor of Korea died, just on the eve of the marriage of his son to a Japanese princess. It was officially reported that the ex-Emperor's death was due to apoplexy. But rumors got into circulation that his death was due either to suicide or poisoning. It was claimed that he had refused to sign a paper which stated that the Koreans were contented under Japanese rule and was made away with because he had refused to do so. It has been officially denied that any such paper was ever presented to the ex-ruler. The news of the ex-Emperor's death was suppressed for a time.

Arrangements were made for the funeral. The Diet at Tokyo adjourned out of respect, after voting 100,000 yen toward the funeral expenses. The consort of the ex-Emperor, who had been assassinated in 1894, was buried not far out of the East Gate of Seoul. It had been decided that the King should be buried about 17 miles from that city, and in accordance with Korean custom it was necessary to bury the Queen by his side. Consequently the body of the Queen was disinterred, and on February 12 the reburial ceremonies were begun and carried through with great pomp, all of the expenses being borne by the Koreans.

These events brought back to the Koreans in a poignant way the remembrance of their national humiliation. March 3 was set for the date of the ex-Emperor's funeral, and it had been arranged that the ceremonies inside the city should be Japanese and outside the city Korean. Needless to say, the arrangements for the Japanese part of the ceremony were not made with the hearty concurrence of the Koreans.

DEMONSTRATIONS BEGIN.

The atmosphere was becoming tense. Evidently the authorities had an inkling that something was brewing, for the principals of schools were called before the prefect at the city hall and told to warn their students not to be led away by the actions of the Korean students in Japan. It should be stated here that during February the Korean students who were attending the various colleges in Japan had started a movement for the self-determination of Korea and many had been imprisoned.

On Saturday, March 1, notices were posted on the streets of Seoul that public gatherings would be held at Pagoda Park, and printed proclamations of independence signed by 33 men were distributed. Shortly after noon a large number of the signers of this manifesto met at a Korean hotel and telephoned to the authorities that they had declared the independence of the country, announcing where they were. The authorities thereupon sent and arrested them. The police published in the newspapers that they had surrounded the ringleaders in an eating house as they were drinking success to their plot.

Meanwhile the people, including many students, had gathered at the park, and from there started to parade some of the principal streets. They walked along in an orderly way, with hands held aloft, calling their national cry of "Mansei," which means "10,000 years." In front of public buildings, such as police headquarters and the various consulates, they would stop and take off their hats and wave them, uttering their cry of "Mansei." At the consulates they sent in letters and their proclamation manifesto. No single act of violence was done. At one point mounted gendarmes charged the crowd and inflicted some saber cuts. The police were arresting as many as they could, and all that evening and on the following day, Sunday, men were being arrested at their homes on suspicion of having been connected with the demonstration. Of the 33 signers, 15 were members of the native cult, the Chuntokyo; 15 were Christians; and 3 were Buddhists. Of the Christians the majority were ministers of the various city churches, many of them college-trained men; one was a Y. M. C. A. secretary; another was connected with the Severance Hospital. Since that day arrests have been made daily, until at present there is scarcely a city church which has not its minister locked up.

On Sunday, March 2, no demonstrations occurred in Seoul. The following day was the day of the ex-King's funeral. The schools had been allocated definite places along the line of march for the Japanese ceremonies. Not one of the higher schools, government, private, or mission, was represented by any but the members of the faculties. The students cut the ceremony dead. The funeral was a military spectacle. The first section, which consisted of naval and military detachments, took 18 minutes to pass a given point. The second section, which took in the Shinto priests, the bier, and the governmental representatives and functionaries, was not so large, and the third section was a line of troops and sailors almost as long as the first. The following day was quiet in Seoul, the Korean ceremonies taking place outside the city. These two days were school holidays.

The next day, March 5, not a single student in the higher schools was in his place, and rumors began to come to the heads of schools that there would be no more students until the country had secured its independence. Since that time, nearly a month ago, not a higher school has been able to open.

On Wednesday, March 5, at the stroke of 9 in the morning, commotion was heard on the main street in front of the railway station. Young men were swarming out of the stores and alleys and making toward the railway station, calling out their national cry. In a remarkably brief time a man in a rickisha started up the street toward the South Gate, surrounded by the throng, who with uplifted arms, carrying red bands, ran through the gate and into the old city toward the palace. This demonstration was composed almost entirely of students, and as it proceeded was joined by high-school girls. The police apparently had been taken by surprise, for the demonstrators had run about half a mile before they were opposed. In the large open space in front of the palace the police were drawn up and charged the crowd with sabers. Many wounds were inflicted. No respect was shown to sex, girls being handled roughly and beaten. Hundreds of arrests were made, including a number of the schoolgirls. No violence was attempted by the students. Their object apparently was merely to demonstrate, and they considered it an honor to be arrested for their country. Nearly all of the student nurses at Severance Hospital rushed out when the crowd passed by the street. They were carrying bandages and were prepared to do Red Cross work if required. Fifteen were arrested and were held in the police station until afternoon. They were questioned closely as to whether the heads of their institutions (the missionaries) had ordered them out. The younger high-school girls who were taken did not fare so well. Most were kept in custody, and more will be told of their sufferings in the jails later.

Various other demonstrations occurred. The street railway employees struck for several days as a protest. The Korean shopkeepers put up their shutters, and have kept their stores closed for over three weeks. The literati prepared a petition sending it to the office of the governor general by the hands of a Christian preacher and a non-Christian. At the office of the governor they were told that such documents should be received at the police department. To the police they accordingly went, and were immediately arrested. It should be noted that the independence manifesto and the petition of the literati are both couched in stately phraseology and breathe a spirit of charity toward those who have inflicted on the Korean nation a mental "reign of terror." (Later another petition was prepared by men who had been ennobled by the Japanese after the annexation, one of these men being the man who in 1866 had petitioned the Korean ruler to conclude a treaty with Japan and open Korea to the west. This man being over 80 years of age and too weak to rise from his bed was not arrested, but all his male relatives were taken into custody and a cordon of soldiers posted about his house. The other was immediately arrested. Both are viscounts.)

DEMONSTRATIONS OUTSIDE THE CAPITAL.

Synchronizing with the outbreaks at Seoul, demonstrations of a similar nature occurred at the leading centers throughout the country. Again, they were orderly. But the minions of the law at the outside centers, where there were fewer foreign eyes to see what took place, behaved in many places with the utmost ferocity. The crowds were fired on and deaths occurred. Two cases of gunshot wounds were sent in from a point in the north to Severance Hospital. At Pyengyang, a large center, foreign observers report that the the crowds were attacked by the members of the fire brigade, who were armed with their hooks which are used to pull the burning thatch off the houses. Many ugly wounds were inflicted. Five men died in a hospital from gunshot wounds, but the authorities are reported to have issued orders that the deaths must not be reported as due to that cause. In the north the authorities seem to have decided to penalize the Christian population, and churches have been wantonly destroyed. In many cases the police have questioned demonstrators and have arrested only those who admitted being Christians. An attempt was made to get 24 wealthy Koreans to sign a statement which said that the 33 signers were low-class people. They refused to do so, and pressure was brought to bear on them for several days before the attempt was given up. It should be said here, to make this point clear, that wealthy men are compelled to submit to periodical police audits of their private finances. There is no halfway government in Korea.

In Hamheung, a point on the east coast, where the Canadian Presbyterians have a mission station, scenes similar to those at Pyengyang were enacted. The fire brigade and coolies armed with clubs perpetrated outrages on the people. An eyewitness statement by Rev. ——— is in our possession. Here the authorities refused to let those injured be treated in the mission hospital. Mr. ——— had occasion to go to the police station during the demonstrations, and saw in a tent the fire brigade, with their hooked poles in hand, and coolies armed with clubs, waiting for the signal to leave the police compound to attack the crowd. The conclusion is irresistible that these men were under the orders of the police. An attempt was made by the chief of police to intimidate the foreigners by saying that their lives were in danger from the non-Christians, but refused to be bluffed, and told the chief that he would be held responsible for any harm that befell the foreigners.

It is not possible at this time to record in detail all of the uprisings in various places. These are fair samples of what occurred throughout the country. The truth will eventually come out as to what has happened in places where no foreigners were present to record what has transpired.

In the official press reports, particularly those which came out in the early stages, the missionaries were openly accused as being the instigators of the movement, and capital was made out of the fact that so many Christians were concerned in it. Every effort was made to minimize the part played by other sections of the population. The police reporters played up the Christian schools and glossed over the facts in regard to the participation of the Government school students and the Buddhists. At the demand of the American consul, official statements have since appeared that the Government discredits the stories of missionary instigation, but the police reports and vernacular press still continue to print them.

POLICE ATROCITIES.

Beating and torture are the cardinal principles of police methods in Korea. When making arrests, usually the victim is cuffed and kicked by several policemen. In the demonstration of March 5 a student noticed that the girl he was engaged to was being attacked by several policemen. He went to her rescue, and was at once set upon by several policemen and severely beaten. He was arrested and has not yet been released, having now been in custody about three weeks. Instances are not infrequent where Japanese in civilian clothes have arrested demonstrators in the presence of the police and have treated them shamefully. Stories of this kind come from Pyengyang and other points as well as Seoul.

From released prisoners stories of cruelty and torture are now pouring out. One student was asked to tell who the leaders were, and his finger nails were pushed back from the skin to assist his memory. Still another prisoner had his finger tips burned for the same purpose. Still another was put in an upright press, which operated with a screw from the back. When the screw is turned the four sides contract, and while the pressure becomes stronger the questioning is carried on—a way of squeezing out information. After being subjected to this torture, the same man had a strong cord tied around the middle finger of his right hand; the cord was then passed through a hook in the ceiling, and his body was pulled up until he was resting on the tips of his toes. He became insensible during the process, and when he awoke found himself lying down while a salve was being applied to his wounds. He left the jail with a swollen hand, which had to be lanced immediately.

The girls fared even worse. For the first few days after being arrested they were confined in the several police stations. As far as can be ascertained, no matrons were on duty in those jails. Or course, the girls were not allowed to communicate with relatives or friends. The main facts in the story of one released girl are as follows: A few hours after being arrested she was brought before an officer, questioned, and beaten by him on the face, shoulders, and legs. The following day the same process was repeated before a second officer. The third day she was taken before a third officer, who called her by vile names and insinuated that she and the other girl prisoners were pregnant. "You can cut us open and see," she retorted. He then said that the Bible taught that sinless people were naked (some coarse references to Adam and Eve being intended) and ordered her to disrobe. She cried, and he did not press his demand. She was again beaten, and the fourth day before still another officer she was questioned and beaten again. One of her ordeals was to kneel down on the floor and hold a heavy board at arms' length for an hour. If her arm trembled, she was beaten again. The girls were always accompanied to the toilet under guard. On the fifth day she was removed to the West Gate prison. She and two other girls were summoned to an officer's desk. She was told to wait outside while her two companions went in. A little later she saw them pass out stark naked, with hair down their backs, holding their clothes in a bundle before them. She was then called in and found two Japanese matrons present with the officer. After being questioned by the officer, she was ordered by the matrons to take off her clothes. After resisting for a time, and being threatened, she did so. Her hair had first been taken down by the matrons. There was no apparent purpose in this request except to humiliate her. After standing several minutes disrobed, she was told to follow one of the matrons. She wrapped her skirt around her and, carrying the rest of her clothes, walked through the hall to a cell, where she found two other girls. On the way thither she passed several male employees of the prison. The following day she was taken out by a matron and taken to a room where a very youthful Japanese doctor was waiting. Again she was ordered to disrobe for a physical examination.

After a long altercation she was allowed to retain one garment. The doctor tapped her chest, asked no questions whatever about her health, and she was in due course taken back to her cell. Several days later a gold-braided official came into her cell, asked her to remove her waist, examined her back and chest, and left the cell. Shortly after this she and a few other girls were released. They were handed over to relatives or school principals, who had been notified to be in attendance. They were constantly guarded by matrons while in the cells, were not allowed to talk, had to remain in a very irksome squatting position all day, and were beaten if they changed their position. They were allowed 15 minutes open-air walking daily after breakfast.

When stories of torture and cruelty to prisoners became current among the missionary community, the Seoul Press ran a couple of editorial articles pointing out that the Koreans were "atrocious liars" and that the stories of cruelties had been investigated, and that the prison authorities assured them that no tortures were taking place. When a missionary showed this article to a Japanese, he naïvely replied that it was intended to mean that there had been no tortures since they had been sent to a certain prison. Another foreigner discussed the editorial with the editor of the paper, who replied that he knew there were cruelties, but that in making that statement he was "speaking officially."

INDIGNITIES TO MISSIONARIES.

The mission body has not escaped uninjured. At Pyengyang, two ladies were prodded with rifle butts as they walked along the street. Two male missionaries were arrested there while trying to protect by their presence only a body of native women whom the police were trying to arrest. After being marched through the streets guarded by soldiers after a stay of a few minutes in the police station, they were released. One of these men was the Rev. Stacy L. Roberts and the other the Rev. E. W. Thwing, of Peking, whose work in antiopium movements has made him an international figure. In southern Korea two lady members of the Australian Presbyterian Mission were arrested and subsequently released. On March 20 the Rev. John Thomas, a missionary of the Oriental Missionary Society, was attacked by soldiers at Kokei and severely beaten. When he produced his British passport it was thrown on the ground and stamped on, as was also a preaching permit which had been given him by the authorities. All of these cases involved consular action, which was promptly taken. At Syenchun the homes of the missionaries were searched shortly after the demonstrations began. On March 17 a body of police, led by a procurator, came to the Severance Union Medical College, placed guards at all the gates and at intervals through the compound, and searched the various buildings of the institution. As already mentioned in connection with the Hamheung incidents, the authorities have tried to get rid of their responsibilities for the protection of foreigners. Rumor has it that a certain consul was asked to warn his nationals to keep off the street, as they could not guarantee to protect them, and the consul is said to have replied that he would issue no such warning and would hold the authorities responsible in case any of his nationals were molested. Two or three days ago the leading newspaper in the capital in an inspired editorial invited the missionaries to confer with the authorities as to the best means of bringing the troubles to a close, and the suggestions of the missionary body have been invited by some representative Japanese. That is the status of the matter at this moment.

On Saturday, March 22, another street demonstration took place at Seoul. It was quickly headed off, and a number of arrests made. On the following Sunday evening demonstrations broke out simultaneously in several different parts of the city. At the East Gate bayonets were freely used and many were wounded. There are persistent reports that a number of deaths occurred. The city is being patrolled by soldiers and is virtually under martial law. It has been so since March 1.

What the outcome will be it is too early to prophesy at this stage. Whether the Koreans will weaken in their stand for complete independence, or pursue their policy of passive resistance until the end, or whether they will accept a program of fundamental reforms, can not be foretold. The revelation of the organizing ability shown in the movement thus far is the surprise and admiration of all who know the Koreans; it is a veritable renaissance. There are many Japanese who realize that their methods of colonial administration have failed to achieve their end, and who are sincerely desirous of bringing about a happier condition. Japan's system has been wrong; it was a German colonial policy, not a British one; it has been an effort to exploit a people and benefit them at the same time. It has been an effort to impose "culture" against the desires of a people with a culture of its own. In the meantime, whatever the outcome, publicity will help both Korea and Japan in their ascent to a higher plane of civilization.

EXHIBIT II.

A GENERAL SURVEY OF SITUATION IN KOREA.

(By a committee.)

APRIL 7, 1919.

It may be well to give you a general résumé of the situation. For some time past the Japanese authorities had planned to marry the young Korean prince, called the Heir to Prince Yi, to a Japanese princess, the marriage to be a symbol of the amalgamation of the two peoples. The date had been set for January 25, and preparations made, when on January 22 the father of the prince, the ex-Emperor, died under very peculiar circumstances. This, of course, postponed the marriage, and from that time on it was evident to all that the Koreans were becoming agitated in mind. Also the peace conference was deliberating in Paris, and the principle of "self-determination of nations" evidently appealed to Koreans as applicable to their country. Koreans living outside of Korea, in China, Hawaii, and America, had also been looking for some opportunity to accomplish something for the liberation of their country, and were evidently in touch with leaders in Korea. How all these streams of influence acted upon each other we do not know precisely, but their interaction resulted in a demonstration which first broke out on March 1, two days before the date set for the funeral of the ex-Emperor.

Thirty-three representative men from all parts of the country drew up and signed a declaration which they printed by the thousands. Fifteen of these men were leaders of the "Chun Do Kyo" (The Heavenly Way Association), which perpetuates the "Tonk Hak" and "Ill Chin Whei" movements, which were prominent in the years immediately preceding and during the Japanese occupation and annexation of Korea. Fifteen others were Christians, and included some of our most prominent pastors, such as Kil Sun Chu of Pyengyang and Yang Chun Paik of Syenchun. The other three were said to be Buddhists. The head of the Chun Do Kyo signed first and Pastor Kil second.

On March 1 these 33 men met in Seoul, sent one of their number to one of the parks of the city to read the declaration of independence to an assembled crowd of people, after which all the signers surrendered themselves to the police. On the same day and at the same hour similar demonstrations were held in seven or eight other cities of Korea. At these demonstrations it was stated that the participants, although Christians or members of the Chun Do Kyo or Buddhists, as the case might be, were acting wholly as individuals. It was further stated that the movement was to be one of passive resistance, no property was to be destroyed and no Japanese or others injured in any way. This character of the demonstration has been consistently maintained up to the present time except as qualified by statements below, police reports to the contrary notwithstanding. After the reading of the declaration of independence, Korean flags were given out to the demonstrators, who stood up, waving them and shouting "Hurrah (Mansei) for Korean independence!"

In Seoul thousands of people had gathered for the funeral of the late exemperor, and on this day surged up the main streets in dense crowds, shouting for independence but otherwise conducting themselves in an orderly manner. In Pyengyang and other cities, also, as far as foreigners have witnessed the demonstrations, although thousands of people joined in the demonstrations, no rioting occurred. The next day, Sunday, was quiet although church services were forbidden in some cities; but on Monday the 3d similar demonstrations were held in many places but not in Seoul, because there the Koreans wished to have nothing mar the funeral ceremonies in honor of the ex-Emperor.

The movement was so secretly organized that neither the missionaries nor the secret police of the Government knew what was going to happen, though all were conscious of the great tensity of the time. There is, moreover, a remarkably efficient organizing power apparently directing the movement. In a very few days it spread to all parts of the land, even to remote mountain valleys. The police, gendarmes, and soldiers were everywhere called out to disperse the crowds and to arrest the leaders. The first day or so no very rough methods were used, but from then on, and especially out in the country districts the most brutal methods have been employed. Men, women, and children have been repeatedly kicked, beaten with fists or gun butts, bayoneted, sabred, and shot, until our mission hospitals and, if report be true, the Government and other private hospitals, too, are filled with the wounded; Severance Hospital having cots and beds in every available space, even the hallways. Testimony gathered from these wounded is consistent that until attacked the crowds of demonstrators used no force but simply shouted for independence, and were fired upon or otherwise attacked. In one place after the crowd was fired upon it attacked the gendarmes, killing four, and in several country towns gendarme stations are said to have been wrecked. In many instances the gendarmes and soldiers have made no attempt at arrests, but merely fired without warning, and have often fired indiscriminately in the direction from which cheering was heard. In addition to this, even women have been stripped of their clothing in the open and beaten severely. Soldiers, gendarmes, and police have broken into houses, and not finding the men they wanted, have dragged women and even children around by the hair and beaten them. In one case at least fire was used to torture a man. These Hunnish barbarities have stirred us all to deepest indignation and have to a certain extent terrorized the people who were expecting merely arrest, yet they remain firm in their determination, although they are changing their method of demonstration and protest for the purpose of saving life. For instance, in the cities of Seoul and Pyengyang especially they have closed their places of business and kept them closed for nearly a month now, and it is said that they are going to inaugurate boycotts and strikes along various lines and to refuse to pay taxes. It is obvious, however, that if the brutal methods of repression are continued, retaliation on the part of the Koreans will inevitably be the result, even though they have no weapon.

In the repression of these demonstrations the authorities have evidently decided that the Christian Church as a church, and not merely Christians as individuals, is responsible, and in some places have arrested every officer of the local church, a course which, together with the general terrorization of the people, has prevented services being held during the month. This, however, is particularly true in South Pyengan Province.

Of course, our mission schools have been involved from the start, the students, both young men and women, giving their enthusiastic support to the movement. The natural result has been that with the exception of Ewa Haktang, which is making a rather unsuccessful effort to keep open, all mission schools have been closed since March 1. They have not been closed by the Government, which, indeed, is anxious to maintain the appearance of normal times and the fiction of tranquillity in Korea, but their closure is due to the fact that many students and teachers are already under arrest, while the great majority refuse to study until the object of these demonstrations has been attained. This is a very serious condition and one which may result in the permanent closing of our schools, the Government taking advantage of this opportunity to order them permanently closed on the technical ground that they have not maintained the required continuous course of study. At least two schools have already been warned to this effect. If this should be the result, a very absurd injustice would be involved, inasmuch as the Government schools are in much the same condition as ours, but are being kept "officially" open by the teachers meeting and going through the motions every day.

Although the foregoing might seem to indicate that the movement for independence is largely supported by Christians and followers of the Chun Do Kyo, it is far from being confined to these two classes. It met immediate response from the people generally, and in some places, in fact, Christians have not taken part in it, although their non-Christian neighbors have. Neither is the movement local, as an inspired press reports, but has spread to all parts of the country and among every class of the population. Furthermore, in the last two weeks the old literati, and even the new nobility, created since the Japanese annexation, in recognition largely of their pro-Japanese services, have sent in to the Government petitions asking for independence and have been promptly arrested. In fact, one of these men is the man who in 1866 first petitioned the old Korean King to conclude a treaty with Japan and open the country to the West, a man who has always up to the present been pro-Japanese and was made a viscount by His Imperial Japanese Majesty. It is reported that such petitions will continue to be presented until even the Government is forced to recognize that all classes of the people support the movement.

In regard to the part which has been taken by the Christians special emphasis should be laid upon a report which comes to us on the best authority to the effect that in the consultations which preceded this demonstration the members of the Chun Do Kyo stood for a declaration of independence and the use of force if necessary, while the Christian leaders maintained that they should petition for redress of abuses and wrongs and governmental reforms, but without the use of force. The compromise program finally adopted was to declare independence and to use no force. In a conference with Government officials, to which we shall presently refer, it was admitted by a prominent official that all must recognize that the absence of the element of force in the demonstrations was due to the participation of the Christians.

One of the inevitable concomitants of this turmoil was the charge that missionaries are the instigators and abettors of the whole movement, a charge which bitter articles in the vernacular press violently supported. We inclose a copy of such an article taken from the second most prominent Japanese paper in the peninsula. The American consul general at Seoul protested to the authorities against these articles, but, although this particular one was afterwards officially "withdrawn," articles of a similar import have appeared in all parts of the country and, of course, in Japan. It is only natural that a strong antiforeign feeling should be aroused especially directed toward Americans. You have doubtless heard ere now of the attack upon Rev. John Thomas, a British subject, of the Oriental Missionary Society, who was set upon and severely beaten by police and soldiers under the belief that he was an American instigator of these demonstrations. There have been reports that Japanese were going to beat up some of the missionaries, and, as a matter of fact, Japanese thugs, armed with clubs and knives, have held a parade through the streets of Seoul headed by a mounted gendarme. These men have been brought in not merely to intimidate Koreans and to precipitate violent rioting but to take part in any underhand work that it may seem wise for the authorities to wink at in these disturbed days. So far as foreigners are concerned, the Japanese officials told a newspaper correspondent that if he would carry a lighted cigarette at night he would be safe, because no Japanese would then mistake him for a missionary. Mr. Holdcroft was stopped by two such men, armed with clubs, when on his way to the railway station at night and subjected to cross-questioning as to his nationality, occupation, destination, etc.

You have possibly seen references to reports published in the Chinese newspapers, notably the Peking-Tientsin Times, the North China Star, and the China Press, giving instances of brutality on the part of Japanese soldiers witnessed by missionaries in Pyengyang, Syenchun, and elsewhere. Some of these were never intended for publication in any form, and certainly not with names, dates, and places embodied and involving missionaries in an apparently anti-Japanese propaganda. They were gathered from individuals by an indiscreet missionary from North China, not connected with our board, who was in Korea for the first two weeks of the demonstration. Most of the material was intrusted to him with the understanding that it was to be transmitted to friends in America, but this individual published them verbatim as soon as he got over the border, and even insisted that they go in with names. We are just as indignant over this as anybody else and realize to what an extent our position has been compromised and to what extent also this will stimulate antimissionary feeling, but, of course, it can not be helped now, and since the American consul general is exerting pressure on Japanese authorities to prevent further attacks on Americans in the local press or by Japanese subjects we hope that none of the missionaries will encounter violence. For the most part we are remaining quietly at home, not even attempting country itineration, and not venturing out at night except in case of necessity. In regard to the reports mentioned above as having been published in the Chinese papers, you should know, however, that though they were not intended to be published in this way and not to be used at all in China, they contain a reliable account of actual occurrences, supported by affidavits now on file at the American consulate general, Seoul.

The ultimate effect of this movement on the church in Korea is wholly problematical. The leaders went into it with their eyes open, realizing that failure of their efforts meant persecution and probably severe repression of church activity, but they said they had prayed the matter through and felt that it was God's will for them to make this attempt to secure not merely civil, but real religious, liberty at this particular time in the world's history, when so many small peoples are apparently to secure these blessings. We learned this from the moderator of the Korean General Assembly and others after the demonstrations began and before he and other leaders were arrested. It is reported that officials have stated that the Chun Do Kyo is to be suppresssed entirely and that the Christian Church is to be reduced to about half its present size. Certainly if the military government remains in Korea and the present movement collapses, the outlook for the future is very dark. If, on the other hand, in view of the obvious failure of the administration of the last nine years to conciliate the people, a civil administration and governmental reforms are introduced, while there probably would not be such an aggressive anti-Christian activity, we must anticipate great restriction of Christian propaganda at best. It is quite evident that the most rigorous repression of demonstrations is directed against Christians in those sections of the country where the church is prominent. In the north a number (15, according to credible reports) of churches have had windows, furniture, bells, and Bibles destroyed by soldiers, gendarmes, or authorized thugs, and in many communities where general arrests are made discrimination is always against the Christians. Undoubtedly the Government regards Christianity as the chief factor of the disturbance, and, conceiving that its previous suspicions have been justified, is acting accordingly.

The effect of the movement on mission work is equally problematical, for the Government, while officially stating that they do not regard the missionaries as having any direct responsibility for this uprising, which took Government and missionaries alike by surprise, seems to be making every effort in the examination of prisoners to fasten responsibility upon the missionary body. This we are repeatedly told by released prisoners, but the Koreans under examination uniformly insist that the missionaries are not connected with the movement. The examinations, it may be said in passing, are frequently conducted with all the approved methods of 1912 "conspiracy case." But the situation is none the less grave. Word has just come that Mr. Mowry, of Pyengyang, has been arrested under charge of permitting the production of seditious literature on his premises. We can only surmise the underlying reason for his arrest. Copies of the independence proclamations and news sheets which he has been translating may have been found in his house, or his secretary may have, without his knowledge, used his mimeograph for printing notices regarding local demonstrations. Anything else is inconceivable. Two Australian missionary ladies were arrested and detained two days. They had gone out to call their school girls out of the demonstrations and were arrested on the charge that they were taking part. These instances indicate the critical character of the situation.

At least three informal conferences have been held with representative officials and civilians in Seoul. At the first Mr. Usami called in a group of missionaries (Drs. Gale, Avison, Hardy, Noble, Sharrocks, Mr. Bernheisel, Mr. Bunker, Mr. Gerdine, and Mr. Hugh Miller) and asked their opinion as to the causes of the uprising. Very frank statements were made, notably one by Dr. Gale (who, after many years of consistent pro-Japanese effort, is now plainly outspoken in condemnation of the failure of the military administration), who told Mr. Usami that the Koreans had been living under a reign of terror for the past nine years. The second and third conferences included such men as Judge Watanabe, Mr. Sekiya, Mr. Niwa, Mr. Yamagata, of the Seoul Press, and some other civilians, and, in addition to most of the above missionaries, Dr. Moffett and Mr. Whittemore and Bishop Welch (and at the third conference Dr. Egbert Smith). The gist of the position of the Japanese was the plainly stated desire that missionaries should cooperate with the Government in suppressing the uprising. Bishop Welch, by a previous agreement among the missionaries, replied, stating that anything other than absolute neutrality was impossible, for three reasons: First, it would be useless for us to try to stop the movement. Secondly, it would be resented and destroy our influence; and, finally, it was forbidden by our home Government. The Japanese continued to urge, however (especially through the semiofficial Seoul Press), that missionaries ought to abandon this technically correct position and undertake real cooperation. We need not point out to you the delicacy and difficulty of the situation. At this conference the question of the actuality of atrocities was raised. Dr. Moffett gave his own personal experience as an eyewitness. In private conversation with Dr. Moffett, Mr. Yamagata, editor of the Seoul Press, cheerfully admitted that he was convinced of the truth of the atrocities, but he said that the denials as published in the Press were "official." In a subsequent interview Dr. Avison and Bishop Welch were assured by Mr. Sekiya that the present "lenient" methods of suppression were to be exchanged for extreme measures in the near future. Dr. Welch assured him that any great amount of bloodshed occurring in this connection would alienate the sympathies of the western nations. The missionaries feel that nothing is to be gained by a continuance of such conferences, which might easily be used to compromise our position still further.

As to the possible success of the independence movement we can only give our personal judgment that it is hopeless; that unless there is outside international interference (which is scarcely conceivable in the present state of the world), administrative reform and possibly, in the future, some measure of self-government is the most that can ever be secured. Japan would scarcely grant autonomy without a complete change of heart and the overthrow of the military party in Japan, and, of course, the revolt may be a flat failure and secure nothing.

This is a disappointment. We have not the remotest thought of meddling in politics, and we can not hold any brief in defense of Christians who have deliberately committed themselves to a program of revolutionary agitation, but it is maddening to have to stand by and see unarmed and unresisting people treated with brutality and violence and even shot down indiscriminately and to know that these things are daily occurring in all parts of the country.

As we look toward the future we need scarcely point out to you that, if and when reforms in administration are granted, any possible pressure that can be brought to bear in the proper quarter should be exerted to secure real religious liberty in Korea. There has not been such liberty in the past, either in regard to Christian propaganda or in Christian education in private schools, as you are aware.

EXHIBIT III.

As a sample of the way in which the local Japanese press is dealing with the situation, we give here a translation of an editorial in a recent edition of the Shosen Shinmun:

"The stirring up of the minds of the Koreans is the sin of American missionaries. This uprising is their work. In investigating the causes of the uprising two or three missionaries have been arrested and have been examined. There are a good many shallow-minded people among the missionaries, and they make the minds of the Koreans bad, and they plant the seeds of democracy. So the greater part of the 300,000 Korean Christians do not like the union of Japan and Korea, but they are waiting for an opportunity for freedom.

"These missionaries look upon the present Korean as they did upon the old Korean, and they consider it proper for the Koreans to say anything they want, if only they enter the Christian schools. They take the statement of Wilson about the 'self-determination of nations' and hide behind their religion and stir up the people.

"The missionaries have tried to apply the free customs of other nations to these Korean people, who are not wholly civilized. From the part that even girl students in Christian schools have taken, it is evident that this uprising has come from the missionaries.

"Behind this uprising, we see the ghost-like appearance of waving his wand. This ghost is really hateful, malicious, fierce. Who is this ghost wearing the dark clothes? The missionaries and the head of the Chuntokyo. These missionaries have come out of the American Nation. They have sold themselves for the petty salary of some 300 yen ($150) per year, and they have crept out like reptiles on their belly as far as Korea. There is nothing of good that can be said of their knowledge, character, and disposition.

"These messengers of God are only after money and are sitting around their homes with a full stomach. The bad things of the world all start from such trash as these. They planned this dirty work, and got into league with the Chuntokyo. If we take all this into consideration these missionaries are all hated brutes.

"Why no public apology in the press? No wonder John Thomas was so brutally attacked. They would not believe him brutal."

EXHIBIT IV.

(Statement by ———.)

On the night of March 2, and the early morning of March 3, 1919, before any demonstration occurred in Hamheung city, a number of the students and one teacher of the Christian school were arrested and taken to the police station.

On Monday, the 3d, it is said that the stores were ordered closed by the police. This caused a large number of people to congregate on the main streets. Some one in the crowd blew a bugle, and with this the crowd shouted, "Three cheers for the independence of Korea," and waved Korean flags. Students from the different schools in the city were present and a large number of them were arrested. On this day Japanese firemen appeared with the fire-fighting lance hooks, but no one was seriously hurt.

On March 4, about 12.30 noon, loud cheering was again participated in by the Koreans. With this cheer the Japanese fire brigade was let loose among the crowds with clubs; some carried pickax handles; others their long lance fire hooks, some iron bars, others hardwood and pine clubs, some with short-handled club hooks. They rushed into the crowds, clubbing them over the heads, hooking them here and there with their lance hooks, until in a short time many had been seriously wounded, and with blood streaming down their faces were dragged to the police station by the fire brigade.

Among those so treated was a young man named Chai Kyusae, a student and a younger brother of one of the Korean policemen. He was crying as if in great pain; his head hung to one side from a terrible wound in the left side of his head; blood was streaming down his face. This man was sent home after a few days in a critical condition.

Another man was being dragged along toward the police station by two Japanese firemen. Across his head was the mark of a violent blow, and his face was knocked out of shape from a blow on the left side, from which blood was flowing. His left leg also hung limp, and he, too, groaned in pain. This man is a Christian, about 50 years of age. After treatment in the hospital for several days he was set free by the police with no charge against him. His name is Chai Haksung.

Another of those dragged to the police station was Fak Yichin, a student from one of the non-Christian schools. His skull was so badly crushed that after a few days he was sent out in apparently a dying condition to the home of his friends.

On this same day at least seven Korean men and a number of girls were taken to the police station in a pitiful condition from the wounds received.

While these scenes were being enacted the police and gendarmes seemed to take no part in the arrests, but simply kept guard over the Japanese fire brigade as they clubbed and arrested the Koreans.

So far as was seen there was no resistance made by the Koreans; they neither lifted a stick nor hurled a stone to defend themselves, nor did they utter a word of abuse against the Japanese.

On March 6 the stores in Hamheung were still closed and consequently a large number of people were out on the streets. Near the cattle market cheering was again indulged in, and with this the Japanese fire brigade again rushed out with their clubs. A number were clubbed and arrested, among whom was one Pyon Eung Kwan. He was struck on the back of the head with a club and was carried, apparently dead, to the police station. Even on this occasion not a stone or a stick was raised by a Korean; not even a word of abuse was heard. After a few days Pyon was sent home a free man, but with no redress.

A few days later, it is said on reliable information, about 10 miles out from Hamheung on market day the Koreans cheered as they had done in Hamheung. They were not interfered with by the police, and after they had cheered the police officer spoke a few kind words to them and they all went home. It is also said that on March 13 the Koreans at Sinheung on market day cheered for Korea. The police opened fire on the defenseless crowd and four were killed and four were wounded. Among the killed was a woman who, at the time, was passing with a jar of water on her head. The sight of the dead and wounded wallowing in their blood so exasperated the Koreans that they stoned the gendarmes.

Four Koreans are reported killed at Sungdok, near Hamheung.

During these days a large number have been arrested, among whom are many leading Christians. This is, in brief, what has happened in Hamheung and vicinity up to the 15th of March.

I was an eyewitness to what happened on March 4, as hereinabove stated.

DECLARATIONS REGARDING ATROCITIES.

(Original signed by ———.)

At Suna Ub.

During the first days of the demonstration in March a crowd of two or three hundred people visited the gendarme station at Suna Ub, Whanghai Province, and told the gendarmes that the country had declared its independence and that they should leave. The gendarmes replied that, of course, if the country had secured its independence they would leave, but that they would need to receive orders from Seoul before they could do so. This satisfied the crowd and it left. A matter of two hours later another crowd of people came and made the same demand. This time the gendarmes opened fire on them and killed five people. A number of others were wounded and thrown into the prison. Later on an old man went to the gendarme station to protest against the treatment meted out to the Koreans. This man the gendarmes shot dead. His wife came in and, finding the body, sat down beside it, wailing, as is the custom of the Koreans. She was told to keep still, and not doing so was also killed. That day or the next morning the daughter of this couple, going to the gendarme station, was slashed with a sword. The wounded men who had been thrown into prison were kept two days; a little bit of rice given them, but not a bit of water. They were in such terrible thirst that they say they drank their own urine. After two days they were turned out by the gendarmes, and some of them were taken over to the Suan Mining Co.'s hospital at Tulmichang. Their wounds having had no proper treatment, gangrene had set in. One man had a bad wound in the thigh which was gangrenous. Another had to have his arm amputated at the shoulder because of the poisoned condition due to neglect after he had been wounded. Of the men who were brought to the hospital one man was about 39 years of age; the others were over 60 years of age.

At Maungsan.

During the first part of March, after the people at this place had shouted for independence, 56 people were asked by the gendarmes to come to the gendarme station, which they did. When they were all inside the gendarmerie compound the gates were closed, gendarmes climbed upon the wall, and shot all the people down. Then they went in among them and bayoneted all who still lived. Of the 56, 53 were killed, and 3 were able later to crawl out of the heap of dead. Whether they lived or not is not known. A Christian woman, in whom we have confidence, made her way to foreign friends after several days' travel and made the above statement. Undoubtedly it is true.

At Anju.

On the night of the — of March, when the people had shouted for independence, but had used no violence at all, the police and gendarmes fired on them and killed seven and wounded many others. These were taken to the local hospital. Later the police visited all the houses in the city looking for those who had taken part in the demonstrations. When they did not find them often they beat the women and dragged them about by their hair. One woman had seven teeth knocked out. The mother of one of the wounded men having told a policeman that if her son died she would take revenge on him, this policeman went to her house and again stabbed her son, who was lying on the floor wounded. The people having protested to the magistrate, he admitted that he had done badly, and the woman whose teeth had been knocked out was able to identify the man who had done it.

At Pan Suk.

To-day, March 29, 1919, I visited the village of Pan Suk, 16 miles to the east of Pyengyang. Here at the edge of the village of some 50 houses is a church and schoolhouse combined. On the 7th of March was held one of the independence demonstrations. Soldiers came and pulled over the bell tower, breaking the bell. With the clapper of the bell and other means they broke all but three of the many panes of glass in the 20 or more three by five windows in the building. They broke the lamps and the pulpit and destroyed all the Bibles and hymn books. Five men and one woman were stripped of all clothing and beaten with guns and with clubs. One man was burnt with matches. The house of the school-teacher was broken into; the chest in which his clothes were was smashed and the clothes burnt. Several were arrested. One man of between 50 and 60 years was taken to Kyengyang and beaten till he died, about the 26th of March. On the 24th of March soldiers came to the village near by, looking for one of the elders of the church. Not being able to find him, they took his wife, a bright looking woman of about 30. They led her, with her 2-year-old baby, to a near-by grove and attempted to force her to tell where her husband was. She would not tell. No doubt she did not know, as the leaders of the church have fled. They stripped her of all her clothing and beat her without mercy. I talked with the woman to-day and she was still stiff and sore from the beating.

At Keng Syo.

On Sunday, March 30, 1919, Rev. ——— and Miss ——— went to Keng Syo. They found, as they said, "A pretty bad condition." The people had not waited for the arrival of the missionaries in the afternoon, but at 11 a. m. had met for Sunday school. As about 25 were praying, soldiers came in, stuck their guns through four panes of glass, beat the keeper, and arrested four men and three women. None of these were officials, the officials either all having been arrested or having fled long ago.

EXHIBIT VI.

(Statement by ———.)

On Wednesday, March 19, 1919, I telegraphed to our Korean preacher at Kokei that I would be coming to Kokei on the following day, object being to see the property of the Oriental Missionary Society, of which I am the superintendent in Chosen.

On Thursday, March 20, 1919, I arrived at Kokei at about 3 p. m., in company with my Korean helper, who can speak the Japanese language fluently. Our preacher there had already informed the police of my intended visit. We had tea at a Japanese hotel and ordered our supper for 6.30 p. m. At about 4 o'clock I went to examine the preacher's house and mission, and while standing outside, examining the land with the object of making some alterations, we saw about five young lads running down the hill, yelling "Mansei." They ran past us, waving flags, and disappeared. We thought no more of the incident, but a few minutes later four soldiers carrying rifles rushed up, followed by several policemen. They took hold of us and beat us, and kicked us mercilessly, refusing to hear of explanation, and started to take us to the police station. On the way I showed the policeman, who was dragging me about, my passport and police certificate issued by the Seoul police on the 17th inst., but instead of examining it, he threw it on the ground. I endeavored to pick it up, but was struck and beaten on the head and kicked, and one Japanese man from the crowd, which consisted of many Japanese and many Koreans looking on, hit me with a long heavy stick as thick as a man's arm. My two Korean helpers were beaten very cruelly, one of them being struck on the face, causing a wound from which blood flowed. On my arrival at the police station I saw the police again cuff and kick my Korean helpers. I was then taken to a room by myself. I remonstrated with a Korean who appeared to be a police officer, and asked that my passport might be found, and at 5.30 they brought it to me. Then the chief of police (a Japanese) came in, and I spoke to him through the Korean officer. He asked me a great many questions and then asked me to return to my hotel, saying he was sorry, which I refused to do, as the crowd was still outside. I told him I had nothing to do with the boys, who had only run past where I was standing. I heard the Korean officer say that the five boys had been examined and they said they did not even know that a foreigner was in the town.

At 8.15, after I had had some food from my bag, which had been brought to me from the hotel, the chief of police again said he was sorry and that they had made a mistake. He brought me two papers, written in Japanese, and asked me to sign them. I refused, not knowing what they were about. My Korean helpers, who had already signed the papers, came and asked me to sign, saying that if I did the police would let me go. I absolutely refused to sign, though they tried to persuade me to do so for about a quarter of an hour. Then, as the train left at 8.40, they sent for two rickshas, and escorted by two policemen we went to the railway station and caught the train for Taiden, where I stayed the night.

EXHIBIT VII.

STORIES OF WOUNDED KOREANS IN SEVERANCE HOSPITAL.

(Interviewed by ———.)

MARCH 29, 1919.

(1) Ri In Ok, a student, 19 years old, from Anju, was wounded in the left leg by a bullet. On March 2 he, with many other students, joined a crowd, perhaps 4,000 strong, and shouted the cry of independence, whereupon approaching the office of the gendarmes about seven Japanese gendarme officers came out and began firing at the crowd. Many shots were fired and 8 men were killed and 20 wounded among the Koreans. The rifle firing dispersed the crowd, who had shown no violence, carried no stones, sticks, or weapons. This young man went to the local Korean hospital, but after superficial treatment was advised to go to the Christian hospital in Seoul, where he could get satisfactory treatment and the bullet could be located. He arrived in Seoul on March 5 and was at once admitted and successfully operated on by the resident surgeons. No religious belief at all.

(2) No Chong Yun, aged 61, a farmer, living just outside Anju, was in the same crowd as above student, and his statement coincides with his, though questioned independently. This man was also shot in the leg, the right one. Asked why he did not go to the Pyengyang Hospital, he replied that he was afraid of the Japanese there, lest they would arrest and further illtreat him. This man also had no special religious belief and did not belong to any church, native or foreign. He came to the hospital on March 5 and was immediately treated by the doctors.

(3) Kim Nam San, aged 27, of Paiju: Went from his village on market day to the local market at Kong Ung with many of his neighbors. There a crowd of about 1,000 gathered, shouting the cry of independence. It was not long before the gendarme force appeared, comprising six Japanese and two Koreans; the former only carried rifles. As the crowd continued to shout, the Japanese fired many times, killing four and wounding three (as far as he knew). He, with others, were running away when a bullet struck him in the shoulder and he fell over. The Koreans used no violence and no weapons, sticks, or stones. This man has no religious belief and does not attend any church or society.

(4) Ko Myen Man, aged 25, lives in Whanghaido. He went to the magistrate's town on March 23, and, joining a crowd of several hundred, shouted the independence cry in front of the magistrate's office. Upon this, gendarmes and police came out with clubs, swords, and guns. They rushed upon the crowd, striking down many with clubs and swords, and also fired their rifles, killing at least 3 and wounding 20 or more. Upon this, the crowd ran away. This man refused to go to the Japanese hospital, but went to the Korean local hospital; but the doctor could do little for him. He recommended him to come up to Severance. He came on March 24 and was immediately attended to and is now recovering. He had a gunshot wound in the upper part of his leg. He has no religious belief and attends no church.

(5) Ri Tol Sa of Duksan, aged 23, said that in the evening about 300 or so villagers gathered and went around the neighborhood shouting the cry of independence. They came to the gendarme station and there, without any violence, stood shouting and waving the Korean flag. The officers of the gendarmes, through the Korean interpreters, asked them to go away. While this was going on motor cars arrived from Seoul (3 or 4 miles away) with a number of gendarmes. Then suddenly about 15 gendarmes came out and fired on the people. As far as he knows 1 was killed and 12 wounded. This man was wounded in the foot. He said that some Korean gendarmes had guns, but he did not know whether they fired or not. All of the crowd were of the working class. He came into the hospital and received immediate attention the next morning (Mar. 26). This man is not associated with any church or sect.

(6) Ri Kai Tong, aged 27, of above village, corroborated the above statement, though in a separate ward. This man was shot in the leg.

(7) Yum Tek Chang, of above village, aged 35, gave similar evidence. He was shot in arm and side. No religion.

(8) Song Yunk Pak, aged 21, of same place. Shot through upper lip. Also indorsed above statements. No religion.

(9) Kang Yong Ie, aged 36, terribly wounded by being shot at close quarters; leg smashed. Gave same account as above. No religion. He is from Duksan.

(10) A man terribly injured in head. Could not give any account of his accident. He is lying in semiconscious state.

(11) Cha Oh Kyun, aged 36, of Ko Yang, about 8 or 9 miles from Seoul, wounded in lower left arm. The stores in the village had closed in sympathy with the desire for independence, but were ordered by local gendarmes (Japanese) to reopen. They refused, and next day about 70 men and boys went up the hill behind the village and shouted the independence cry. The local gendarmes, a Japanese and a Korean, came out, and the Japanese fired. This man was shot and the others ran away. The Koreans used no violence, had no stones or sticks, only a Korean flag or two. This man said that the local gendarmes used to be fairly friendly. He did not belong to any church or sect, though once used to attend the Chundokyo meetings, but had not for some time. He came to the hospital on March 28 and promptly received attention.

(12) An Tong An, 54, of Ko Yang Koon, was struck on arm with a sword in its scabbard, and when down on the ground was beaten with clubs. He said that 500 or so gathered in the neighborhood and, after marching around, shouted the independence cry outside the gendarmes' office. A number of Japanese gendarmes (so he thought) were there in civilian clothes, and very soon 5 mounted policemen, 5 gendarmes with guns, and 20 civilians (private clothes policemen), rushed down on the crowd. This was after the gendarme officer told them to go, threatening them with his revolver, whereupon the crowd said they were not afraid of that. The Koreans used no violence and did not carry sticks or stones. He came to the hospital March 28 and had prompt attention. He has no religious beliefs.

(13) Kim Kwang Un, aged 72, of Anak, went to On Chang market, and, with others, perhaps 500 or 600, called "Mansei." The head gendarme exhorted them to go away, hit several, and insulted others with bad names. At this the crowd surged round and asked why he should strike the people, and as there were several arrested in the gendarme station they asked for their release. The crowd would not disperse, so two Japanese and two Korean gendarmes came out and fired, killing 3 and wounding many, perhaps 20. Then the Koreans, enraged, threw stones at the station, and the gendarmes continued to fire from behind the fence. This man was shot in the shoulder. He tried to get to Seoul, and was arrested at Chinnampo, hands tied, and he was beaten and insulted and questioned as to who told him to go to Severance. The same thing happened at Chai Ryung Ub, but after telling him to go to the Japanese hospital they found that he was not to be frightened and let him go. He came to Seoul and was given immediate help. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

(14) Song Yun Pok, of Duksan, aged 21. Shot in face. Broken half of bullet extracted from upper jawbone behind. Gave same evidence as other men from Duksan.

(15) Koo Nak Saw, admitted in frightfully mutilated condition. Died after two hours. Got no particulars from him.

(16) Ri Nam Kee, aged 22, of Paju, beaten with clubs so badly that we could get no information from him as to particulars of wounds. Admitted on Saturday, March 29, and died at 1, Sunday afternoon.

(Statements taken by ———.)

(17) Sung Yong, aged 16, lives near the river at Hyum Sung Li. On the evening of the 23d of March, at 10 p. m., this boy went out with a crowd of men and boys, shouting "Mansay." About 20 soldiers came to disperse them. Most of the crowd scattered. This lad dropped behind and was wounded by a bayonet in the hands of one soldier who ran ahead. Then a second soldier came up behind and thrust a bayonet into the lad's stomach. The cut was 4 or 5 inches in length on the right side of the abdomen. He was a third-year student of the Huun Sang School. He had a grandmother who had attended the Presbyterian Church. He himself had gone a few times only. His mother was not a believer.

(18) Yi Han Dom, aged 32. At See Ki Moon An, inside the little East Gate Seoul. About the 22d of March several hundred men went out without any stones or clubs and cried "Mansei." Soldiers came and fired on them. One shot him, and he will probably lose an eye.

(19) Mi Syun Myung, aged 33, a rice huller. At Tukum went out with a crowd of about 500 men, unarmed. Yelled "Mansei." Four gendarmes came on the scene, fired, killing one and wounding eight others, of whom he was one. Not a member of any church or of the Chundokyo. He was shot through both legs with one bullet.

(20) Chung Yung Heui, aged 34, lives in the county of Paiju. On March 28, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, a crowd of 400, yelling "Mansei," were met by Japanese gendarmes, who fired. Eight men were killed. They had done no violence, and were not even armed with rocks. This man was shot through the neck.

(21) Yu Yung Kun, aged 42, a leader of the Sin San Lee Presbyterian Church in Paiju county, 65 li from Seoul. A crowd of probably 1,000 men went out with bare hands to cry "Mansei." He was shot by Japanese gendarmes, who followed, shooting as they ran. Three were killed and three wounded. This man was shot through the side of the neck.

(22) Koo Chun Myun, a farmer, aged 34, went out with a crowd of 500 or 600 at Kwang ju Ub on 27th of March at 1 p. m. The gendarmes fired, and this man was hit on the jaw and a large part of the jawbone shot away. Three were killed, and this man severely wounded.

(Interviewed by ———.)

APRIL 1–5, 1919.

(1) Song Si Ung, of Po Chun, aged 47, gave same evidence as previous man. (See No. 16, Series 1.) This man was shot in top of skull. Bullet extracted by Dr. Ludlow. No religion.

(2) Syung Myeng Ni, aged 32, of Duksan, was shot in leg and operated on by Dr. Ludlow. This man is not in normal senses, so can not investigate particulars. Took part in crowd shouting, as others above. No religion.

(3) San Syen Nan, aged 27, of Po Chun, San Myen, Syen Tai Li. Went to market at Solmoo Chang on market day, and, with about 200 others, called "Mansei." The gendarmes came out, warned the people not to enter the market calling out. But the crowd continued to come on. They had no sticks or stones and showed no violence. The Korean gendarmes fired into the air, but the Japanese gendarmes fired into the crowd. Nine were killed and many injured. This man was shot in the leg, and managed by stealth to get up to Severance. No religion.

(4) Pak Yun Nak, aged 25, of Ko Yang Kun, Chi to Nyen, Totangki, a church member in Sa Myen Church, met with all his villagers and those of other villages at the end of March, and, without violence, paraded the village, calling "Mansei." Some mounted gendarmes came from Seoul after this and told the people to stop calling and parading and to go home. This they did, and that day there was no violence or trouble. Five days later a number of gendarmes from Seoul came down, and, going from house to house, inquired if the occupant had called "Mansei" on the previous occasion. This man replied "yes, but we stopped and went home when you told us to." This man and many others were arrested and taken to Seoul. At the governor general's (he said, not the prison) he and many others were taken out and flogged. I saw the bruises on his body. He received 60 strokes, 30 at 12 o'clock and 30 at 2 o'clock. Many others received like treatment. He is now in the hospital awaiting attention.

The following young men gave exactly the same evidence:

(5) Chung Hung Pong, aged 16.

(6) Ri Chun Sai, aged 21.

(7) Chang Oo Sang, aged 24.

(8) Pak Cha Kwo, aged 41, of E. Chun Ub, Ri Chung Moon, Umnai Myen, Pang Ko Ri, arrived in hospital April 3 with bad bullet wound through neck. Was attended to immediately and life saved. He, with others, shouted on market day. There was a big crowd but no violence shown. In the evening they were attacked by the Japanese gendarmes and many killed and wounded. This man's neck was in such bad condition that he could hardly speak and so could not give much evidence.

(9) Kim Kum Tung, a lad of 15 years (13 western count) of Choong Chong Do, was brought to the hospital on the back of his father. He was shot through the thigh and forearm. The father gave the following account: The little village, as arranged, went out on the evening of April 1, and shouted "Mansei." About midnight fires were lit on the hills, and shouts went up, but no violence was shown. Presently eight Japanese gendarmes appeared and fired on this band of 20 men and boys, with the result that one was killed and 13 wounded.

(10) Pang Choon Ho, 25 years, of above village, shot in leg, gave similar evidence as above. His younger brother, Pang Sin Sik, aged 21, was shot in many places on legs and arms, and his elder brother was killed.

(11) Pak Syung Koon, aged 44, of above village, gave a like account of the shooting affray. This man was shot with B. B. shot. He was struck in many places.

(12) Ri Pok Yun, aged 26, of Suwon, said that on the last of March he joined a crowd of from 300 to 350 villagers from the neighborhood. They paraded through the villages until they came to the Myen So (district local office). There the Myen Jang (village headman) joined them, and they went on to the police office. The Korean officer in charge came out and said, "Because I am a policeman in the Government employ and wearing a uniform I can not join you, but my heart is with you. Go on, call out 'Mansei,' and I hope we will get independence." Going a little farther they were suddenly approached by three Japanese soldiers, who fired, wounding two men, who fell. The other demonstrators ran away, but on seeing that two of their neighbors were wounded, 40 or 50 of them came back. These were at once arrested under threat, tied together, and taken to the Suwon police station. There they were kept for two days, searched, examined, and beaten from 50 to 90 strokes, and then sent home. The two wounded men were also sent home. In the meantime a Japanese doctor had looked at the wounded men and tied up this patient's leg, which had a bullet wound, with cotton wool. He came to Severance Hospital on April 4. The crowd did no violence, he asserts, simply waved the Korean flag and shouted the independence cry.

EXHIBIT IX.

DEATH OF A KOREAN YOUNG MAN BY NAME OF KOO NAK SOH.

On March 27, at about 9 p. m., a large body of young men gathered at Andong, Seoul, and shouted "Mansei." The shouting had continued for a few minutes when a large force of police gendarmes and soldiers arrived and dispersed them. The above-named young man, like the others, was peacefully going home and alone, was walking along a small street when suddenly some one pushed him violently in the back, causing him to stumble and fall. His assailant was a policeman, who had seen him in the crowd and followed him to the place where he thought fit to make the attack. After throwing him to the ground the policeman drew his sword and literally hacked at him "like a woodsman would attack a rough old oak." His skull was cut right through so that the brain was visible. This had been accomplished by at least three sword cuts falling in or near the same place. His hands were terribly cut; his left wrist was also cut through to the bone. Those who saw the corpse stated that there were 20 sword cuts, but the photograph only reveals 10.

After this brutal attack on this unarmed and defenseless young man the officer ran away, leaving him in his terrible agony to expire in a few minutes. Some Koreans, happening to pass by, carried him to the nearest native hospital (Kuck Chai Hospital), but little could be done, so they placed him on a stretcher and started out for the Severance Union Medical College, still thinking that his life might be saved. Waile hurrying to the Severance Hospital they were stopped by a policeman from the Honmachi police station, who spoke to them in a threatening way and did all he could to prevent the case being taken to a foreign hospital. They remonstrated, saying that the case was so serious that a delay in taking the man to the Japanese hospital, which was some distance away, would surely result fatally. The Japanese are naturally anxious that such cases should not be seen by foreigners. On arriving at the Severance Hospital, medical examination revealed the fact that the man was already dead. It is impossible to say just when he died. His dead body presented the most pitiful appearance. Numbers of sword cuts had mutilated his head and hands. His clothing was saturated with blood—indeed, a sight never to be forgotten.

During the following day his little cousin, a mission-school girl, stood watch over his body in the morgue; nothing would persuade her to leave the remains of the one she loved. Another life has been sacrificed for the cause of Korean liberty. "We hope that the great God who sees our pitiful state will come ere long and judge in righteousness and justice."

(NOTE.—The deaths so far are estimated at about 1,000, while those in prison number about 6,000. The people have not one rifle or sword among them. They lift up their empty hands and call upon God and all those who knowing Him love righteousness and justice.)

STATEMENT CONCERNING REMOVAL OF WOUNDED MEN FROM SEVERANCE HOSPITAL, APRIL 10.

(By ———.)

During the forenoon of April 10 a gendarme sergeant named H. Inouye called at the office and stated that the police wished to examine certain of the wounded men at our hospital, and asked that these men be sent to the Yamadomachi gendarmes office for examination.

The request being reported to Dr. Avison, he said that the question of their removal would have to be determined by the surgeon, Dr. Ludlow, and suggested that the examination take place at the hospital rather than that the men be subjected to the dangers of a transfer. To this they agreed, requesting that a private room be arranged where the examination could be conducted privately. They thought it might take one hour for each man.

In the afternoon, Gendarme Sergt. H. Nagase, accompanied by nine gendarmes, came to the hospital and presented his card and a list of seven names of men who were to be examined. Dr. Ludlow was called in order that he might determine whether the cases could be removed from their beds to this room. Such as could be removed were examined in the room, while the others were examined at the bedside. The examination was completed in much less time than had been anticipated, so that they were through with it about 5.30 p. m., I think.

Sergt. Nagase then said he would take five men with him for further examination, leaving two with us, providing we would undertake to notify the police department 24 hours before their being ready for discharge. Dr. Avison called Dr. Ludlow and asked him to state whether these patients could be safely removed. Dr. Ludlow stated that none of them ought to be removed at this time. The officer said they had a doctor at the police department who would make the dressings and look after the treatment. Dr. Ludlow then objected in particular to the removal of three out of the five men, and after a time they consented to leaving one of those three. After further conversation they consented to leave another, taking with them three men, as follows:

Yum Myung Suk, gunshot wounds in abdomen and arm.

Song Yung Pok, gunshot wound in face—bullet extracted.

Yee Myung Keui, gunshot wounds in groin and thigh.

Four men were left in charge of the hospital superintendent, Miss Esteb, with directions that 24 hours previous to their being ready for discharge the police department should be notified. They are as follows:

Yi Kai Dong, gunshot wounds, right thigh and left knee.

Kang Yong Yi, gunshot wound, thigh, large portion torn away.

Kim Il Nam, gunshot wounds, both thighs and cheek.

Ryoo Soon Nyung, gunshot wounds, both thighs.

STORY OF TORTURE BY RELEASED MALE PRISONER.

On the 1st day of March, 1919, at 9 o'clock, a demonstration began, starting from the Nandaimon Station and proceeding toward and through the South Gate. The demonstrators were calling "Mansei" as they ran. I happened to be in the vicinity when the demonstrations started, and, impelled by patriotic impulses, I joined the crowd and proceeded with them for some distance. I then returned to the railway station district, and some policemen, noticing perspiration on my forehead and neck, arrested me as a demonstrator. Three Japanese gendarmes took me to police headquarters, where I spent the night in a cell.

About 10 o'clock the next morning I was called before a procurator and examined. I was asked: "Why did you shout 'Mansei'?" I replied, "I was so glad to hear about the independence of Chosen that I joined in the shout." "Who instructed you to do so?" "There was nobody who instructed me; I did it of my own accord." "In that case," he replied, "you have not only violated the peace, but are a real rioter. You shall be punished, you may be sure of that." I replied, "You may punish me according to law." "Are you a Christian?" he asked. "Yes; I am."

After this I was taken to an inner quarter and shut up for two days and nights. About 11 o'clock in the morning of the third day I was released, after being admonished.

Two days after I was released a friend called at my home, and I dined with him that evening. I talked to him about a letter I had received from a friend of mine in America. My friend asked if he could read the letter, and I showed it to him. He asked me to let him take it away with him, but I did not want him to take it. Then he said, "If you will let me have it, I can stir up the students in the Y. M. C. A. Industrial School. I can reach thousands of people. The students of that school are employed everywhere. I can also reach those employed in the tobacco factories. I can make this letter of use in helping the independence movement." I replied that I was sorry I could not let him have it. I bade him good-bye.

Next morning about 10 o'clock two gendarmes came to my home to arrest me. I went along with them, and was imprisoned in the police headquarters. About three hours after being locked up I was brought before an examiner. The procurator asked, "Do you know your crime?" I replied, "No; I do not know my crime." He said angrily, "You must tell about the communication between you and your friend in America. If you do not, you will be punished by torture." "I have had nothing to do with it at all," I replied. At this the gendarmes who were standing near me struck me on the face with their hands. This made me indignant, and I kicked them repeatedly. For this they beat me terribly. The procurator interrupted the mêlée, and I was put in solitary confinement. Torture apparatus was placed near me. Soon after I was put in a press in an upright posture, the sides of the press contracting as a wheel on the back was turned. I was then told to reveal the truth. But I continued to maintain my innocence. I kept on protesting, and said, "Kill me if you like." I was again put in the press, which was screwed so tightly I could scarcely breathe. Still I protested my innocence to the end. They said, "This man is a knave," and threatened to kill me.

After this they took the middle finger of my right hand, tied strong cord around it, passed the end of the cord over a board near the ceiling, and pulled on the cord until my whole body was hanging by the finger, only the tips of my toes touching the floor. I gradually became unconscious. When I awoke I found myself lying on the floor, and do not know how long I had been left suspended. I felt my forehead and found it wet with perspiration. Although I could scarcely move my body, I tried to make myself as comfortable as I could.

The following morning about 11 o'clock I was again brought out for examination, and after being admonished was released the second time. My home had been searched, and no evidence of any kind had been found.

My hand was in a swollen condition, and I went to a Korean doctor for treatment for several days. Not receiving much benefit, I came to the Severance Dispensary, where I received treatment in the surgical department.

EXHIBIT XI.

THE EXPERIENCE OF A KOREAN GIRL UNDER ARREST BY THE POLICE.

(Statement by ———.)

It was on the 5th of March that I with others, who for the liberty of our loved land formed into a procession at the South Gate, and as a token that we were ready to shed our blood for liberty wore red belts and red bands on our arms. We were marching from the station toward Chongno, cheering and shouting "Mansei!" As we were nearing the Dok-su Palace all of a sudden a Japanese policeman seized me from behind by my hair, and I was violently thrown to the ground. He kicked me several times with his merciless foot. At this I was rendered almost unconscious. He rushed me along by my hair, and I was led to the Chongno Police Department. At the entrance of the police office 20 or more Japanese policemen who stood in line sneered and kicked me and struck me with their swords and struck me in the face so many times that I became almost unconscious. The cruelty was so great that at times I did not realize whether they were beating me or some one else. This was really more than I was able to bear. My hands and legs were bleeding terribly. My body was black and blue from their blows.

I was led into a room, and here again I was handled brutally, as before. They dragged me on the floor, they struck me in the face, they struck me with their swords, they flung me to one corner of the room. At this point I must have been completely unconscious, as I do not remember what happened after that.

On recovering my senses I found myself in a room packed with young men and women. I saw some of them handled so brutally it almost broke my heart to see them beaten. After some time we were cross-examined by a police officer one by one. It is beyond my power to convey to another person how those cross-examinations were carried on. I was made to kneel down with my legs bound together, and each question and answer was accompanied alternately by blows in the face. They spit in my face. This with curses and invectives of the worst kind. He said, "You prostitute, you vile, pregnant girl!" I was ordered to expose my breasts, but refusing they tore my upper garment from me, and I was told all sorts of inhuman things which shocked me terribly. They tied my fingers together and jerked them violently. This made me feel as if my fingers were being torn from my hand. I shut my eyes and dropped down on the floor. Thereupon the examining officers uttered a loud, angry roar and ordered me to kneel down as before, then rushed at me, seizing me by the breast, and struck me violently. Is there anything to be compared with this inhuman treatment? He then said, "You want independence, eh? Preposterous thought. You will get independence when you are locked in jail. Your life will vanish with a stroke of the sword." He then shook me fiercely by the hair. He pulled me by the ear. But he was not satisfied even with this, so he beat me on the head with a stick without mercy. They made me extend my hand and hold up a heavy chair, which, if I let drop, he would strike my elbow with a stick. He made me kneel down near a window with the chair held up as before. If the chair was lowered or it touched the windowpane, he would come and strike me. An hour or so was passed in this manner, when I was told to go down the stairs. I found that I was completely exhausted. I could not walk. I crawled on the floor with much difficulty, even with the help of one of their professional spies, who followed me. I arose and attempted to go downstairs. As I made the first step down my strength gave out, and so I rolled down the whole length of the stairs. I was again unconscious.

On recovering my senses I was obliged to crawl into a room. The policeman in charge of the room was very much amused to see me crawling into the room. He laughed loudly at my misery. Then I prayed and seemed to see Jesus and was much comforted from on high. I thank the Lord for the comfort he gave me at this time.

I spent five days in all at the police station. Then I was sent to the West Gate penitentiary. There I was stripped naked and was looked at by the men. Then I was allowed to put on my dress and was led into a room. I was sneered at and cursed beyond my power to realize. In this room there were sixteen persons who were like myself. The room was not very large, and so we were densely packed together. The toilet arrangements are placed in the room just like the pig's shelter. The room was so filthy that it was not fit even for pigs. We were given beans and salt to eat. While we were eating now and then some one would look in and call us all sorts of names—"You dogs!" "You pigs!" etc.

On the second day a person called the police doctor and several others came in and weighed me stripped naked. They, too, sneered and spat upon me. Now and then I was told by the keeper there that I would be tried publicly. I looked forward to that with a great deal of consolation, as I thought I would have some chance to state my case without reserve, but, alas, I was let out one day without trial and without being told the nature of my offense, or indeed that there had been legal offense.

STORY OF RELEASED GIRL PRISONER.

(Reported by ———.)

To-day, March 28, 1919, a girl, ———, about 21 years of age, came to our home and told the following: "I was arrested on the streets of Pyengyang the 3d of March and taken to the police station. There were many others, both men and women. They asked if we smoked, if we drank, and if we were Christians. Soon all were let out with little or no punishment, with the exception of 12 Methodist women, 2 Presbyterians, and 1 Chun Do Kyo woman. Three of the Methodist women were Bible women. They stripped all the women naked in the presence of many men. They found nothing against me, except that I had been on the street and had shouted 'Mansei.' They beat me until the perspiration stood out all over my body. Then they said, 'Oh, you are hot,' and threw cold water over my naked body. My arms were pulled tight behind my back and tied. Then they beat me again until my body was covered with perspiration, and then threw the cold water over me. Then, saying I was cold, they stuck me with the lighted end of their cigarettes. (Some were stuck with hot irons.) My offense was very little compared with those who made flags, took part in the independence, etc. Some were beaten until they were unconscious. One young woman was just at the time of her monthly sickness. She resisted having her clothes taken off. They tore off her clothing and beat her all the harder—but did not pour the cold water on her. After four days we were taken to the prison. Here we were packed in a room with men and women. One day an old man was beaten until he died. One of the Bible women was right next to him. She asked to be moved, but they compelled her to watch the dead body all night. One of the Bible women not only had her hands bound but had her feet put in stocks. They took our Bibles away and would not allow us to talk or pray. They made vile and indecent remarks to us. All this was done by the Japanese. Though there were Korean policemen in the room they took no part in the beating or in the vileness. The Japanese know the Bible and blaspheme the name of Christ, and asked us if there was not a man by the name of Saul who was put in prison. They asked us most of all as to what the foreigners had said, and were most vile and cruel to those who had been with the missionaries, or who had taught in the mission schools. Some of the girls were so changed that they did not look like persons."

Later, one of the above women died in the prison. (This not confirmed.)

EXHIBIT XIII.

BRUTALITIES AT TAIKU.

(Statement by ———.)

On March 8, when occurred the demonstration here and many arrests were made, a young man by name of Kim Yong Nai, the son of the elder helper of the Third City Church, and a regular member of the same, was seized by a Japanese officer, thrown to the ground, and, while prostrate, was kicked several times on the head and back of the neck. He was bleeding profusely when led into the police station. The above I have from an eyewitness.

He was kept in jail for two weeks. During this time, the eyewitness referred to, who was in the next cell and was released at the same time, testifies that he heard his friend cry out a number of times at the pain of punishment which was inflicted upon him in jail, which frequently took the form of beating one on the head with the iron key of the cell. When released, he still complained of his head. In a few days after his release he was taken sick, and complained that he suffered terrible pain in his head and that it "seemed as if all one side of his head was gone." He became delirious and died after an illness of about 10 days. The night he died he was protesting in his delirium that he was innocent and that his punishment was too severe. The doctor who attended him states that he died from blows on the head. I saw the body and the neck and the base of the skull was darkly discolored. He was a secretary to a Japanese lawyer and very widely known in the city. His father is still in jail and another member of the family is at the point of death.

Among the demonstrators at a magisterial town near here three men were shot dead and a number wounded and some 40 or 50 taken prisoners. Among the wounded I have seen one and have the following story direct from him: In the early evening there had been a demonstration and some arrests made. Late in the evening he and some 15 others were standing at an inn, where was a man who had been wounded. Three Japanese soldiers and eight policemen gathered and ordered the men to leave. My informant's brother asked what they meant by shooting down an innocent, unarmed man. Whereupon a soldier clubbed him with his gun. Upon seeing his brother thus treated, he objected, and was fired upon and shot in the side. While blood was streaming from this wound, he again complained against such treatment, and was answered again by another shot through the neck. This second shot was fired by a local Japanese merchant, although there were at least 10 regular officers of the law present and only some 15 men gathered. I understand that two Japanese civilians did all the shooting that day and boasted of the same.

I had another personal testimony from a released prisoner of the use of the key placed between the fingers and the fingers being tied at the ends; the key is turned until the arms become paralyzed. This is the second personal testimony from eyewitnesses to this form of torture.

The reports of deaths from shooting we hear are all understated, and no record of the death or burial is made.

I spent the entire day of April 11 at the court attending the trial of some seventy-odd Christians. Among them, and recommended for six months, were some who testified that they were simply in the crowd, but had called nothing. It seemed that everything was construed in the severest form.

ARTICLE IN SEOUL PRESS EXONERATING MISSIONARIES, MARCH 14, 1919.

Rumors have been rife that foreign missionaries incited the disturbances, or, at least, showed sympathy with the rioters. These rumors owe their origin to the fact that among the leaders of the rioters there have been found Christian pastors and students of mission schools, so it is not to be wondered that they gained currency. But that they are entirely groundless has been established by the result of investigations into the matter conducted by the authorities. The authorities have carried out thorough and strict inquiries concerning it and are satisfied that there is no trace whatever that foreigners instigated the disturbances. Nor is there any evidence that they knew beforehand of the occurrence of the trouble or gave support to the rioters. It is wrong to harbor suspicion against foreigners without justifiable grounds. It is still more to be condemned to spread through the press false reports and baseless accusations against foreigners, fabricating such reports and accusations out of mere suspicion. Such acts will excite the ill feeling of foreigners against Japan and may cause trouble in international relations. Should any foreigners be found guilty of sedition or similar offense, the authorities will have no hesitation in prosecuting them; but, as none have been found to be responsible for the recent trouble, people at large should cast away whatever doubt they may still entertain against them.

EXHIBIT XV.

THE DEMONSTRATION AT TONG CHAING.

The village of Tong Chaing contains about 300 houses. The young men of the place had been wishing to make a demonstration for some time previous, but Mr. Han, an elder in the church, and other church officers discouraged it, as they feared that there might be violence on the part of the demonstrators, there being a body of 500 miners working in the mines not far away who might take this occasion to rise against the police.

But on March 29, this being market day and many people having come in from outside, a demonstration was started by some children. Others joined in until there were four or five hundred people marching through the town and shouting "Mansei." The demonstration was entirely peaceful, no stones were thrown, and no resistance was offered to the officers of the law. The police came out and arrested 17 persons, half or more of them being Christians. Among those arrested were five women. Later on other arrests were made. The people arrested were all taken to the police station. From this point on this account will be confined largely to the experiences of three of these women:

—— is a widow living in Tong Chaing. She is 31 years of age (Korean count), and has one child. She was in the crowd calling "Mansei," and was arrested by a Japanese policeman. She was taken into the office and a policeman tore off the underclothes and she protested. As a result they struck her in the face with her hands till she was black and blue. She clung to her underwear, and they put a wooden paddle down between her body and the underclothes to pry them away. They beat her systematically on the arms and legs with a paddle. The beating continued for some time. The police then stopped the beating and sat down to drink tea and eat Japanese cakes, meanwhile making fun of the woman sitting there naked. There were many men in the room. After about an hour they allowed her to have some of her clothes, and sent her into an adjoining room where many of the arrested people were detained. About the time the lights were lighted in the evening she was called out again into the office and put in charge of an elderly man and his wife with instructions to be responsible for her and bring her back when summoned to do so. For a week afterwards she had to lie down most of the time and could not walk around.

—— is a widow, 34 years of age, and has two children. She also had a part in the demonstration. She was arrested by a policeman. On the way to the station, though not resisting, her arm was twisted to the point of dislocation. Taken into the office at the police station, the policeman struck her in the face with his hand, then forced her into a sitting position and kicked her in the head. She fell over here and he continued kicking her. Then he forced her to stand and ordered her to take off her clothing. She took off the outer clothes, but left on the underclothes. She was ordered to remove these, but did not do so. At this point in their treatment of her the proceedings were interrupted by another outburst in the cheering out on the street, and many of the policemen went out to make further arrests. She was allowed to put on some of her clothes and was sent into the next room where those arrested were detained. She was kept there all night and released the next morning with the woman whose account is given below.

Both of the above women belonged to the middle class of Korean women, not the coolie class, and are bright, intelligent women. Both have attended the Bible Institute for a number of terms.

—— is the wife of ——. He was a teacher for a time in the ——. She is a very bright, intelligent woman. She has one child 4 years of age and is probably two or three months advanced in her second pregnancy. She had taken a small part in the demonstration, and had gone to the house of Pyo Hak Sun to comfort Pyo Hak Sun's mother, who was distressed because her daughter had been arrested. As she came out of the house several police and soldiers came into the yard. They knew she was the school-teacher and had been searching for her at the school. They accused her of trying to hide, which she denied. Asked her if she had called "Mansei," said that she had. They ordered her to leave her child, which she was carrying on her back and come with them, and she obeyed. As she stood in front of the door of the police station a policeman kicked her forcibly from behind, and she fell forward into the room. As she lay, stunned, on the floor a policeman put his foot on her head. Then he forcibly raised her up and struck her many times over the head and face. He jerked at the strings that held on her clothing and ordered her to remove her clothes. She hesitating, he tore them off forcibly, meanwhile constantly kicking and striking her. He also beat her with a heavy stick and with a paddle. He tore off her underclothes and kicked her in the chest and beat her, accusing her of setting the minds of the Korean children against Japan, and said that he intended to beat her to death. She tried to cover her nakedness with the underclothes that had been stripped from her, but they were grabbed away. She tried to sit down, but was forced to rise by constant kicking and beating with a stick. She tried to turn away from the many men in the room, but was constantly forced to turn again so as to face the men. She tried to protect herself with her hands and arms, and one man twisted her arms behind her back and held them there while the beating and kicking continued. All parts of her body were beaten. She became benumbed and was losing consciousness of pain. Her face swelled and her body became discolored. She had to be held up and the ill-treatment continued. Finally they ceased and put her at one side of the room, leaving her there for a time. They then took the lunch mentioned in the statement concerning Chung Chung Yul. She was afterwards ordered to put on her clothes and was sent into the next room with the others. About 9 p. m. the three women mentioned above and the other two women who had been arrested were again called into the office. They were asked if they now realized that it was a wrong thing to call "Mansei" and if they would repeat the attempt. They released three of the women but kept Pyo Hak Sun and Yi Hyo Syung. These two women were sent back to the side room, where they spent the night as well as the other prisoners.

The next morning the examination of the prisoners began, some men being examined first. In the meantime the news of the way the women were being treated spread through the village and a crowd of about 500 people gathered in the morning. Some of them were for attacking the police station and taking revenge for the mistreatment of the women. But Elder Han advised against the use of violence or doing anything unlawful. Finally cooler counsels prevailed and it was decided to send in two representatives to make a protest. Two men were chosen, neither of them Christians, and one of them speaking Japanese, and these two went into into the police office, the crowd waiting outside. They protested against the stripping of the women as being unlawful. The chief of police said that they were mistaken; that it was permissible under Japanese law. Also said that they were searching for unlawful papers. The men then wanted to know why they stripped only the younger of the women and not the older, and why they were beaten after being stripped, and why only women and not men were stripped. The chief of police could not answer. There was considerable conversation. The delegates from the crowd were determined, and the crowd itself was getting more and more restless and noisy, many demanding that they, too, be imprisoned or that the prisoners all be released. The chief of the police was finally forced to yield, and he agreed to release all but four of the prisoners.

———, the widow mentioned above, had to be supported on either side as she came out. ——— had to be carried out on a man's back. As they saw the women being brought out in this condition a wave of pity swept over the whole crowd, and with one accord they all burst into tears and sobbed. Some of them cried out, "It is better to die than to live under such savages," and there was a strong sentiment in favor of attacking the police office with their naked hands, of capturing the chief of police and stripping him and beating him to death. But Elder Han and other wiser heads prevailed and kept the people from any act of violence, and finally got them to disperse.

A day or two later representatives of 600 miners from the mines not far away came to Elder Han and inquired the particulars of the affair from him. They said that it was impossible to bear with such savages, and that they were determined to make an attack on the police and take revenge. He argued with them for some time. One of them at least had been drinking, and he got out of patience with the elder and hit him in the groin. But the elder finally persuaded them to at least wait until the Christians then under detention in the police office were either released or sent to some other place, as the Christians did not wish to be implicated in any violence.

Later another demonstration was held here and at least two men were reported shot, but as it had no particular connection with the one partially described above there is no necessity of details being given here.

STATEMENT ON POLICE METHODS.

(Letter to Hon. ———.)

APRIL 7, 1919.

DEAR MR. ———: We planned for the opening of the new term of college and academy on April 4, after the vacation which began March 5, when the students had been dismissed earlier than expected, and diplomas were given without graduation exercises, because the night before the dormitories were visited after midnight by the firemen with clubs and some of the students dragged out and beaten. On April 2 and 3 there was a systematic canvass of the city houses and students from mission schools were arrested, some of them beaten, some soon dismissed, and others detained under arrest. Word from the chief of police to one of our Japanese professors was that students entering school for the new term must be sent to the police station, where they would be examined. As in the minds of all, such arrest was usually accompanied with beating and kicking and such mistreatment before any investigation or inquiry as to conduct it was impossible to expect any students to enroll. And, as for the academy, two students came, one former student and one new one, they disappearing, however, upon the appearance of the prefect and his interpreter with swords, who came to inquire as to the prospects of opening the school. At the college one student came, but left at once upon hearing what the chief of police had said. Whether this was intended to prevent the opening of schools I do not know, but it may account for the nonenrollment of students.

That afternoon, April 4, about 3.30 p. m., when most of the missionaries had gathered for a prayer meeting at Mrs. Holdcroft's home, a cordon of police and gendarmes was suddenly picketed all about our property and procurators and police and gendarmes began to search our residences. We were telephoned to from one of the houses. I immediately went to my house, found the compound gates shut and gendarmes on guard, about 20 police and gendarmes picketing the compound, and, upon going into the house, I found my wife and children watching some 16 to 20 gendarmes, police, and detectives, in charge of a procurator and his interpreter, already searching three rooms. I asked the head man if he had a search warrant, and he replied: "No; it is not necessary." I said: "I can not give my consent to the search." He then gave me his card, and I said: "Of course, you can forcibly search, but it will be without my consent." He said that that would be all right. (I judge that as he was a procurator he had the legal right to search, even without my consent.) They spread through the whole house, and in my study, and in Mrs. Moffet's bedroom made a most thorough search of desks, drawers, bureaus, papers, letters, etc., even going into my property deeds and the safe.

They were not rude nor disrespectful, and one said that he did not like the job but had to do as he was ordered. However, it was anything but pleasant to have to endure the indignity of having 20 officers, gendarmes, police, and detectives take possession of everything in order to find practically nothing. In my study, among my secretary's papers in the drawer of his desk, they found the following inconsequential things:

1. A copy of the program of the Prince Yi memorial service and the independence service of March 1, written in ink in Korean.

2. A small piece of paper with a statement in Korean of the number of men killed at Anju and the number of those who had taken part from the several villages at Anju in the demonstration.

3. An envelope directed to the theological seminary, coming through the mail with stamp and postmark on it, containing five copies of the independence newspaper. This had come when I was in Seoul, and was in the secretary's desk, where my Korean letters are placed.

None of the above had I ever seen before, and the procurator's interpreter afterwards told me that my secretary also denied knowledge of the first two.

After searching the house they searched the outbuildings, the guest house, and an empty Korean house in the lower part of my compound, where my Bible woman and her son, my secretary, had lived for years, and which they again had permission to occupy. As we were trying to open the front door of the guest house, my secretary came out of the back door, where apparently he had been sleeping for several nights. (I did not know he had occupied this room, although he had had my permission since February to reoccupy the Korean house where he had formerly lived; that is to say, this house in the lower part of the compound.) They seized him, tied him, and, according to the statement of my two sons, who saw it (I did not see it), they hit him, kicked him, punched him, his nose bleeding, and one man hit him across the cheek with a short whip. In the empty Korean house referred to they found two copies of a mimeographed notice in Korean—thin paper rolled up into a small ball and thrown away. The detective told me that a boy had confessed that several of them had taken my mimeograph from the study and printed notices in that empty house. I, of course, knew nothing of it, and if true it was probably done during my nine days' absence in Seoul, March 17 to 25.

While searching my house, the houses of Miss Snook, Mr. Mowry, Mr. Gillis, Mr. McMurtrie, Mr. Reiner, Dr. Baird, and the Foreign School dormitory were also searched. Miss Betts refused permission to search that house, as they had no warrant, and their supply of procurators being short, there was no procurator in that party of police, and they refrained from searching her house. At Miss Snook's house they arrested the matron, cook (a woman), and a young man, Miss Salmon's secretary, searching Miss Salmon's room very carefully. At Mr. Mowry's they arrested a teacher of the City Church School, who was leaving just as the police came, he having come to see Mr. Mowry, the principal, about the opening of school that day; also a student who had just been released from jail and had come to tell Mr. Mowry about his release. I think another boy was taken there, and I understood they expressed disappointment at not finding Mr. Mowry's secretary. At Mr. Gillis's house they arrested a boy who had been working in his garden for two weeks, a theological student from the country who had come in, and a medical student from Seoul, formerly a student here. These three had hidden in the house before Mr. Gillis returned from prayer meeting. In Mr. Reiner's yard—who had been somewhere on the compound and who was trying to escape, gave himself up to the gendarmes, who proceeded to beat him, strike him on the head, and knocked him down, after which they kicked him on the head several times. At Dr. Baird's they arrested a college student who was acting as secretary to him.

So far as I know there was nothing wrong about any of these being on our places or in our houses, most of them having regular occupations. But as the whole population is fearful of unlawful beatings, some of them, when they saw the police coming, hid and tried to escape capture. They searched my cook, also, but did not arrest him. They marched off with their captives and went through the seminary dormitories, from which they took another mimeograph, and breaking two windows in the Southern Presbyterian Cottage for Professors, I am told, arrested a man who had gone in there. Three men came back and asked to take two mimeographs from my study, to which I consented, asking for a receipt, which they said I could get the next day at the police office. That night, between 7 and 8 o'clock, Mr. Mowry telephoned me that a messenger from the police office had come, asking him and me to go down. I met them at my gate, and we went down together. We were shown into a small room where were three police, and sat down, waiting for 35 minutes before Mr. Mowry was called out for examination. While waiting, we were talking together in English, when one of the policemen said, "You are not allowed to talk." Surprised, I replied, "What, are we under arrest?" He jumped up at once and said, "Wait a minute," went out, and came back shortly, saying, "Never mind, it is all right." I replied, "Of course it is," and we continued our conversation. After Mr. Mowry was called, I was kept waiting another hour, and was then called out for examination before the procurator and his interpreter who had searched my house, also a scribe, and for a part of the time another elderly official. They were very polite and very pointed in their questions, asking particularly about my knowledge of or connection with the independence meeting of March 1; about my secretary, his being on my place, and about the keys of the house in which he had been, and whether he could have had the use of the key without my knowledge; about the use of my mimeographs, whether with my consent and knowledge as to the use to which they had been put. They asked about the three papers found in my secretary's desk in my study, and about my absence in Seoul; about the salaries of my Bible woman and secretary and my own financial condition, saying that I was reputed to be very wealthy, owning much land. After an hour's questioning, in which they learned that I knew nothing, had consented to nothing, and was in no way a party to or knew anything which may have been done by my secretary or others on the place or with my mimeograph (the secretary always having full access to the mimeograph for secretarial work), that I had stayed in Seoul on account of medical work for my wife and child at the hospital, and that the land in my name was the property of the board of missions, of the church, and of schools, they finished the examination.

I then made request for a policeman to accompany me and Mr. Mowry home, as it was near midnight and a missionary had recently been stopped at night on the way to the railway station by two Japanese armed with clubs, and it was not safe for foreigners to be out at night. They said there was no danger, but I called their attention to the fact that the Japanese papers were publishing abusive articles about us and that the low-class Japanese had great hatred toward us. They consented to send a policeman, asking me to wait a little while, and I was shown into the main office of the police station, where I saw sitting on the floor at one end the group of students and secretaries who had been arrested that afternoon and Dr. Bayard's translator, who had been arrested the night before. I asked if I might speak to them, but was refused permission to do so. After waiting some 20 minutes the procurator and his interpreter came in and said that they would send a policeman home with me. I suggested that I wait for Mr. Mowry, but they said that his examination was not yet finished and that I had better go first. I then asked to see Mr. Mowry, to tell him that I was going out and would relieve his wife's anxiety by telling her that they would send a policeman with him a little later. One said, "He is now being examined, but I will tell him." I then went, accompanied by a Korean policeman, but could not waken Mrs. Mowry, so went home. I did not sleep well, and in the morning had a hard headache, so stayed in bed. About 7 o'clock Mrs. Mowry telephoned Mr. McMurtrie that Mr. Mowry had not come home and asked if I had. He came to see me, and I suggested that he get Mr. Bernheisel and at once go to the police station and ascertain the situation, and if Mr. Mowry were under arrest to ask the nature of the charges, telegraph you at once, and ask to see Mr. Mowry and send him food. Mr. Bernheisel will write you what followed. I hope that I have not written in too great detail, but it seems better to write some things which may seem of trivial import rather than leave out the very things you may wish to hear.

Saturday afternoon, April 5, five of those arrested were released—Miss Snook's matron cook, Miss Salmon's secretary, the city school teacher, Mr. Gillis's working boy, and Dr. Baird's secretary; and on Sunday morning Dr. Baird's translator was released, the translator reporting that while he was not beaten, the others had been shamefully beaten while being examined. Saturday afternoon Mr. Mowry's secretary, who graduated from the college in March, came to Mr. McMurtrie's and said that he thought it best to give himself up to the police and not to try to escape from arrest. We then arranged that Mr. Bernheisel should go to the police office, Dr. Moore taking him down in his auto, and report to the police that his secretary was ready to deliver himself up if they would send out a man for him. Dr. Moore brought the man, a detective who knows all the students, back in his auto, and Mr. Mowry's secretary, Yi Po Sik, came out from Mr. McMurtrie's and gave himself up. Mr. McMurtrie accompanied him and the detective in the auto to the police station, and we thus secured him immunity from beating on the way. The secretary did this on his own initiative. He asked me for advice, but I told him that he would have to decide for himself. When the police came on Friday he had hidden and escaped arrest.

This is all I need to report now. I shall write you later commenting on the situation. I would say, however, that personally I do not believe Mr. Mowry has done anything which renders him liable to the law.

STATEMENT CONCERNING THE REMOVAL OF WOUNDED MEN FROM SEVERANCE HOSPITAL.

(By Dr. O. R. Avison, president.)

During the forenoon of April 10 a gendarme sergeant named H. Inouye called at the office and stated that the police wished to examine certain of the wounded men in our hospital and asked that these men be sent to the Yamadomachi gendarmes office for this examination.

The request being reported to Dr. Avison, he said that the question of their removal would have to be determined by the surgeon, Dr. Ludlow, and suggested that the examination take place at the hospital rather than that the men be subjected to the dangers of transfer. To this they agreed, requesting that a private room be arranged where the examination could be conducted privately. They thought it might take one hour for each man.

In the afternoon Gerdarme Sergt. H. Nagase, accompanied by nine gendarmes, came to the hospital and presented his card and a list of seven names of men who were to be examined. Dr. Ludlow was called in order that he might determine whether the cases could be removed from their beds to this room. Such as could be removed were examined in the room, while the others were examined at the bedside. The examining was completed in much less time than had been anticipated, so that they were through with it about 5.30 p. m., I think.

Sergt. Nagase then said he would take five men with him for further examination, leaving two with us provided we would undertake to notify the police department 24 hours previous to their being ready for discharge. Dr. Avison called Dr. Ludlow and asked him to state whether these patients could be safely removed. Dr. Ludlow stated that none of them ought to be removed from the hospital at this time as they still needed treatment. The officer said they had a doctor at the police department who would make the dressings and look after their treatment. Dr. Ludlow then objected in particular to the removal of three out of the five men, and after a time they consented to leave one of those three. After further conversation they consented to leave another, taking with them three men, as follows:

Yum Myung Suk: Gunshot wound in abdomen and arm.
Song Yung Pok: Gunshot wound in face, bullet extracted.
Lee Myung Keui: Gunshot wounds, groin and thigh.

Four men were left in charge of the hospital superintendent, Miss Esteb, with directions that 24 hours previous to their being ready for discharge the police department should be notified. They are as follows:

Yi Kai Dong: Gunshot wounds, right thigh and left knee.
Kang Yong Yi: Gunshot wound, thigh, and large portion torn away.
Kim Il Nam: Gunshot wounds, both thighs and cheek.
Ryoo Soon Myung: Gunshot wounds, both thighs.

STATEMENT BY A KOREAN STOREKEEPER.

"On April 1 a Japanese policeman and a detective came to my home and asked to see the owner. I replied that the master of the house had gone to the country. I was told to telegraph immediately for him, saying the police required to see him at once. The officers then told me that I must go with them to the provincial police bureau. I asked that they go first and I would follow right away. To this they replied, 'We must go together.'

"On arriving at a police box the policeman telephoned somewhere, stating that the master was away and that he was bringing one of the employees, and asked whether that was satisfactory. The reply was 'yes.' I was then escorted by these officers to the provincial police bureau, where on entering I found a large number of business men. We were spoken to and then given a notice which we were told to read carefully. We were further told that we had broken the law and had done very badly for a whole month by keeping our stores closed, but for that offense we would be forgiven. If, however, after this special forgiveness we again offended by not opening we would be punished severely by the law. We were then asked to sign the following guaranty: 'If you will please help and protect us we will open our shops immediately.' We were told that if we refused to sign this document we would not be released. As far as I know all signed.

"A spy then accompanied me to the store and threatened that if I did not open he would take me back to the police bureau. I opened reluctantly, and in a short time one Japanese and one Korean spy came and stayed around the store until closing time.

"April 2, 1919, I did not come down to the store until late in the morning. When I arrived I found that the lock had been wrenched and the staple broken, so that the doors could be opened. I had not been in the store long when a Korean policeman came and stated that I must report to the police box at Kurigai. I went along with the policeman, and the son of the proprietor accompanied us. We were asked why we had not opened early, to which I replied that owing to some special business it was impossible. A Japanese policeman slapped me on the face for this answer. The son of the storekeeper was also slapped quite frequently. I was struck only a few times. One of the officers in the police box wrote on a piece of paper: 'I promise to open the store at about 8 o'clock in the morning.' To this I had to put my seal.

"April 3. I came down to the store at 9 a. m. and opened up. Pretty soon a policeman came and said, 'Why did you not open up at 8 a. m. as you promised?' I made some excuse, so again I was told to go to the police box. Once more I was scolded, but not struck. The officer said that I must write another statement, in which I was allowed to open between 8 and 9 a. m., but not later.

"April 4. Opened between 8 and 9 a. m. and no trouble."

A PERSONAL LETTER.

(To a Canadian.)

APRIL 10, 1919.

DEAR MR. ———: I suppose you have heard of the Korean revolt. All of us are so exercised over it that it is hard to keep our noses to the grind or our hands from the big stick. We are forced to keep as free from entanglements as possible. The Japanese have followed their usual methods—terrorism and blustering. They have tried their best to shoulder the blame of it upon the missionaries, but, fortunately, the rising was as much a surprise to them as it was to the authorities, if I mistake not. However that may be, let me state my reason for writing. I have tried to get an honest grasp of the young Korean's mind, and have put the result of my investigation down in black and white. I am sending you a copy. I found that the outstanding thought which remained with me was the failure of Japanese imperialism in Korea, so I have given the paper that pretentious title. Surely the proof of successful rule is a happy, thankful, and prosperous people. Korea can come under none of these heads. You saw something of it yourself. If traveling in Korea was so annoying to you, you can take it from me that it is a great deal more so now. ———, my old teacher, came back from Japan the day before yesterday. Every place he reached he found that his coming had been telegraphed ahead, and that he was expected. Some system, eh? He was arrested twice, and though they could find nothing against him and let him go, it was not before he got his tale of stripes. One numskull of a Japanese gendarme tried to force him to sign a paper saying that he would not continue his studies in theology but take up farming. Men are being arrested here every day, and even before a question is asked them are flogged with a 2-inch square rod. Doctor and I saw two men to-day who came from the local consulate a few days ago. One fellow had left his house to-day for the first time since his release four days ago, he was so badly battered and bruised. Their shoulders were a horrible sight. Torture of the most primitive kind is used and some finer touches added. For example, one of our Christian school-teachers told me yesterday that after his flogging failed to elicit the information the Japanese wanted, they bound his two first fingers together and gauged a pen through between. Try it and see how it feels. The devilishness that finds the nerves that give excruciating pain and yet does not mutilate is—what shall I call it—Germanic? The offense of these fellows was one of having waved a Korean flag and having shouted "Mansei! Long live Korea!" I could tell you of dozens of such stories, and you would scarcely credit them. Here is one, for example: Four young fellows arrived in ——— the first day of the demonstration and took no part in it. They were theological students and were found in the college dormitories by Japanese soldiers. Tied to a wooden cross, they were given 39 strokes with a paddle, and told that as Christ suffered on the cross, it was fitting that they should do the same, and told them they must be bad fellows since they were Christians.

Well, I have written a whole paragraph, with what continuity of thought I don't know, but the idea that runs through it is clear enough. I want you to know what is happening. You will have heard from other missionaries, but you can't hear too much. Japan is proving the Hun of the East—the big bully that strikes where no retaliation can forthcome. Koreans have been remarkably restrained. But read the article. If you think you can get it published without implicating the mission, do so. It is only right that Canada should know, as well as other lands, what Japan is at home. Talk about "No race discrimination." Let her begin at home. If you should publish it, let it be under the name of ———, or no name at all. If you can't get it published in the papers, at least try to get the facts of the poor Koreans' plight before Canada some way. I know that we should try to keep as free as possible from political affairs. But you need to see things for yourself, and then ask whether our religion must be denied the right to throw its white light into the dark corners. We can do nothing but publish the facts, but that is all they expect of us. And we in ——— have a better chance than our men in Korea. I am sending this by Chinese post.

FIRST ACCOUNT OF MASSACRES AND BURNING OF VILLAGES.

Statement of H. H. Underwood as to trip to neighborhood of Pal Tan Market, town in county of Suwon, Kyongki Province, April 16:

Party left Seoul about 9.30 a. m., by writer's auto, and proceeded to Pal Tan by way of Suwon and Osan, a distance of slightly over 46 miles in all. About 2 miles before reaching Pal Tan a large cloud of smoke was seen rising from behind a low hill beyond the market town. The car was stopped for lunch here, and the writer strolled over to a near-by cluster of houses and finding a farmer engaged him in conversation. After a little preliminary talk:

H. H. Underwood. What is that smoke?
Farmer. That is a village that has been burned.
H. H. U. When was it burned?
F. Yesterday.
H. H. U. How was it burned?
F. (glancing around fearfully). By the soldiers.
H. H. U. Why? Did the people riot or shout for independence?
F. No; but that is a Christian village.
H. H. U. Has there been no cheering for independence here?
F. Sometime ago there was in the market town on market day.
H. H. U. But not in that village?
F. I do not think so. Why would they shout all by themselves without any gathering of people?
H. H. U. Have the soldiers been here to this village? Are you Christians?
F. Oh, no; there are no Christians here.
H. H. U. What is the name of that village?
F. Chay Amm Ni (Cheamni).

I then found another man in the same village, and the same questions brought the same answers, with the added information that there were few or no travelers, and that it was difficult to know what was happening, and that the people had not been allowed to gather for market on the last market day.

After lunch we drove down to the town and left the car, as it was impossible to cross the stream at the entrance to the town. We walked past the police station, which is situated where the two main roads entering the town meet. A file of soldiers of the Seventy-eighth Regiment was standing outside the station. As we were passing a Japanese policeman came out and demanded where we were going and ordered us into the station. We entered as two Japanese officers got up and left. We all noticed their shoulder straps, which were red with three stars. This, I am told, is the badge of first sergeant. The policeman who had called us into the station shouldered a carbine and followed the officers, and in a moment we saw them setting off on the road to Namyang, with the policeman in the lead.

Mr. Curtice now presented his card to the officer and conversed with him in Japanese. I do not speak Japanese, but knew a little, and followed a large part of the conversation. After chatting about the roads, bridges, mutual acquaintances in Seoul, etc., Mr. Curtice casually asked about the fire. The chief said that there had been a small fire but that it was now out and did not amount to much. Asked about the disturbances, he said that there had been a little disturbance in that part of the country, but that it was now over.

After some more general conversation Mr. Curtice asked if rickshas could be procured in the town, as we would like to make a little excursion and see the fire. The chief asked, "Which fire?" Mr. Curtice said the near-by one, but that we would probably like to take a little ride for three or four miles in the country. The chief seemed a little surprised, but said "Yes," and sent a policeman with us to the ricksha stand, where we hired three rickshas and set out. The village from which the smoke was rising was not more than a mile from the town, and after a short ride we left the rickshas and walked around the foot of the hill, on the sides of which was the village we had seen.

Our estimate and the statements of the Koreans agreed that the village consisted of about 40 houses, all of which had been burned down except four or five which were left standing. The rest were heaps of smoking ashes with flames still visible here or there. We saw groups of women, children, and old men sitting on the hillside above the village watching the ruins in dumb despair.

We walked the entire length of the village, and about halfway up we saw a corpse of a young man, horribly burned, lying just outside of a building, which we learned later had been the church. This body was photographed where it lay. After going the length of the village we came back along the hillside and called to a man sitting in one of the groups mentioned. He came and I questioned him, but found that fear and shock had numbed him. He held his head in his hand and said that everything he had and all the results of years of hard work had gone. I condoled with him and asked when the fire had occurred. He said, "About this time, yesterday" (2 p. m.).

H. H. Underwood. How did it start?
Korean. By the soldiers.
H. H. U. Were many people burned or hurt?
K. The soldiers killed all the Christians who were in the church.
H. H. U. What were they in the church on a Tuesday afternoon for?
K. Why, the soldiers came and ordered all the Christian men to gather in the church.
H. H. U. Were there women in the church too?
K. No; the women were told not to come.
H. H. U. Well, after the Christians gathered in the church what happened?
K. The soldiers fired on them and also used their "knives" (swords and bayonets) and then set fire to the church.
H. H. U. How did the other houses catch?
K. Some caught from the church and others, on the other side, where the wind did not carry the flames, were set on fire by the soldiers.
H. H. U. How is it you are alive?
K. I am not a Christian, and only the Christians were ordered to gather.
H. H. U. Your house also was burned?
K. Yes; there are the ruins (pointing).
H. H. U. But there are a few houses left; how about those?
K. Those stood by themselves.
H. H. U. About how many were killed in the church?
K. About 30.

I then left this man and walked over to another group. Here there were several young women with babies at the breast and old women and a young boy about 19 or 20.

These people were Christians and knew Dr. Noble of the N. Methodist Mission, in whose district this church was. I asked the same or nearly the same questions, and got the same answers, as to time, method, number of killed, the setting of the fire, etc., etc. I asked the young man how he happened to be alive, and he replied that he had been away gathering wood on the hills and had returned at night to find all his friends and male relations dead and buried under the flaming ruins of the church. These people showed us where the church had stood, and we went down and found another corpse, which was also photographed. The other bodies were still under the ruins of the church.

The people were absolutely destitute, here and there a few household goods had been snatched from the flames, but none of the little groups seemed to have more than a very small bowl of rice or grain for all the survivors, and they said that most of them had lost their grain, seeds for the coming year, and everything, including domestic animals, on which they are very dependent. We bid good-by to this group after taking their picture, and walked through the village to one of the houses that was still standing. Here our owner was a very old man who said that his house stood alone and had not caught and had not been set because he was not a Christian. His account of the event tallied in every way with that of the others. He also did not know how many had been killed, but also put the number at about 30.

After taking a few more photos, we returned to the rickshas and started back to the town. The ricksha coolies offered to take us to another place, about 3 miles farther on, Suchone, where the same thing had happened a few days before. They volunteered that about 15 places had been burned, in most cases Christian centers. The tallied with other stories, and with reports brought up to Seoul to the missionaries in charge of the district. The soldiers had been brought in by auto about 2 weeks or 10 days before and the first villages had been burned at that time. The chief of police had reported that the trouble had been over some time, and we heard no accusations that there had been any violence on the part of the Koreans in this village which we visited. The police claim that violence had been committed in other places. We bade good-by to the police and returned to Seoul by auto as we had come, reaching Seoul about 5.30 p. m.

It will be understood that as I was born in this country I can be absolutely sure as to the conversations with the Koreans, and, of course, of the things which I saw. The Japanese conversation, however, I only followed by words here and there, such as "fire, riot, small, no, yes, bridge, road, auto," etc.

ADMISSION BY GOV. GEN. HASEGAWA.

[Japan Advertiser, Apr. 27, 1919.]

(Special to the Japan Advertiser.)

SEOUL, April 25.

The governor general of Korea denounces the harsh measures taken by some of his subordinates, and some of these, guilty of one of the worst atrocities reported, have already been subjected to appropriate punishment.

The governor general yesterday received a delegation of prominent missionaries who had visited certain Korean villages which had been burned by soldiers this month. After listening carefully to their description of their investigation he replied that their statements of what had occurred were true, and that it was to be deplored.

MUST NOT BE REPEATED.

The ones responsible had been punished, and strict orders had been sent throughout the peninsula forbidding further acts of this kind. His hearers might rest assured, he declared, and might assure other foreigners, that there would be no recurrence of such happenings.

The governor general added that at any time that the missionaries had anything important to discuss they could lay it before him personally.

The governor general's assurance that these harsh repressive measures by subordinate officers were not countenanced and would not be tolerated by the Government is most gratifying.

AID FOR SUFFERERS.

A committee appointed by a representative meeting of the foreign community waited on Gov. Matsunaga to ascertain if they could assist in relieving the sufferers from the late trouble. The governor outlined what the Government was doing and said that private Japanese had also contributed. He was willing to receive foreign contributions, which he would distribute and personally give account for. After thanking the governor, the committee withdrew to report to the central committee.

ATROCITY OF FIRST MAGNITUDE.

The facts reported to the governor general and referred to in the above special cable to the Japan Advertiser from its Seoul correspondent deal with an atrocity of the first magnitude, the particulars of which have reached Tokyo.

The missionaries who investigated were in a party of 10, who visited several villages which had been burned by the Japanese gendarmes and soldiers, the villagers being driven out of their homes and not permitted to take with them anything whatever of value. All they owned was destroyed, and the villagers, young infants and old men and women, have been hiding in the hills, afraid to return to the site of their former homes, and without shelter, food, or covering for their bodies at night. Among these refugees in the hills are some wounded ones, whose wounds have perforce gone untended, with many cases of blood poisoning setting in.

GATHERED VICTIMS TOGETHER.

In the course of their investigation, the searchers for facts reached one village where the little church had been destroyed by fire. The gendarmes and soldiers, marching into this village, had summoned the men of the village to attend a meeting in the church, where they were told certain orders would be read to them. They gathered in the building, some 50 or more.

As soon as the men had all been gathered together, the soldiery opened fire upon them through the open windows, after having surrounded the building. Volley after volley was poured into the gathering, until the floor was covered with heaps of dead and moaning wounded men.

To complete their work, the surviving women of the village told the missionaries, the soldiery entered the building and bayoneted all the men whom the bullets had not killed, while two women who had approached the building to learn the fate of their husbands were likewise bayoneted and their bodies thrown among those of the men. Then kerosene was poured upon the dead, and the bodies and the church building consumed by fire.

When the advance guard of the investigating party reached this place, there were two bodies still left in the smoking ruins, the others having been raked out and disposed of out of sight.

This is the report, in part, the missionary party has made to the governor general.

THE MASSACRE AND BURNING OF VILLAGES.

[Correspondence in the Japan Advertiser, Apr. 29, 1919.]

The Advertiser correspondent, under date of April 20, says:

THE BURNING OF CHEAMNI.

"For some time past I have been hearing persistent rumors of the burning of entire villages and the more or less complete wiping out of the inhabitants. Latterly these reports came from a district lying 15 or 20 miles west of the large town of Suigen, on the Seoul-Fusan Railroad. It was difficult to obtain the exact name of the places said to be burned, but finally word was received from people coming from the district that the village of Soo Chon had been wiped out by soldiers.

"Mr. Curtice, of the American consulate, asked me if I was willing to make one of a party which would attempt to go through by automobile, and find, if possible, the truth regarding the rumor, and the village of Soo Chon in particular. Mr. Underwood, who was born in the country, and as a missionary has made a very careful study of the language and speaks it with great fluency, was engaged with his car to drive us there and act as interpreter for the party. As a mechanic and assistant in case of accidents, we also took a Chinese chauffeur.

"We left the consulate on Wednesday, April 16. Our route was along the main highway from Seoul to Suwon (Suigen), which parallels the railway. Passing through this ancient walled city, we continued on the old highway, which in historical interest and appearance can be compared to the Tokaido of Japan, until we came to the town of Uoan (Ooan), on the railroad line, and here we turned sharply from our southerly course to one due west.

"The road, which was marked on the map as third class, in no way exceeded our expectations, and the 15 miles that we covered before abandoning the car for rickshas was full of incidents connected with narrow, rotten bridges, good driving, and lucky escapes.

SMOKE STILL RISING.

"About noon we drew up on the slope of a hill, at the foot of which lay a large town, which, according to our reckoning, should be the market town of Parang-Chang, from which our destination, Soo Chon, lay distant 3 miles farther. Mr. Underwood went to a group of farm houses near where we had stopped to learn whether our supposition was correct and whether the people could give us any confirmation of the burning of Soo Chon. The farmers said that the town before us was Perang-Chang, where the police office was, and that Soo Chon, which was 3 miles farther on, had been burned. Pointing to a cloud of thin smoke rising from behind a hill about a mile distant from the market town, we asked what it meant.

"'That,' was the reply, 'is a village called Cheamni, which the soldiers burned yesterday at a little after midday.'

"A question as to the reason of its being burned elicited the statement that there was a Christian church in the village and many Christians. To a question the farmer replied that he was not a Christian and told us what was told him, but that he and the people thereabout kept very close to their houses lest they should be suspected of sympathizing with the sufferers.

"After a brief lunch we drove down to the market town, where we found the only bridge entering the place would not bear the car, so we started on foot past the police station, which was just on the other side, and in front of which was drawn up a squad of about 16 soldiers of the Seventy-eighth Regiment, under command of noncoms. They allowed us to pass by without comment, but shortly came running after us and took us to the police station.

ALL QUIET AT PRESENT.

"Here the police officer in charge received Mr. Curtice's card and asked us to be seated. Mr. Curtice talked to the officer in charge, starting with the formal conversation usual in such cases, and leading up to the question of our desire to obtain rickshas and continue our journey on to Soo Chon. The question was asked him if there was any trouble in the district, and he replied by saying all was quiet at present, though there had been a demonstration in the market town of Parang-Chang some time before. Asked what the smoke over the hill was, he replied that it was a small fire that occurred yesterday.

"The probability of our visiting the place, which lay on the way to Soo Chon, was mentioned, and no objection was raised, only surprise that we should trouble about visiting the scene of a small fire, the implication being of greater ones farther on. A Korean policeman was sent into the market with us, and we took the rickshas he secured and went out on the road about a mile to where a small trail led over to the smoking hamlet. Here we left the rickshas and proceeded on foot.

"When we got to the place, which had been a village of about 40 houses, just under the lee of a low hill, we found only 4 or 5 standing. All the rest were smoking ruins. We passed along the path, which ran along the front of the village lengthwise, and in about the middle we came on a compound surrounded by burned poplars, which was filled with glowing ashes. It was here that we found a body frightfully burned and twisted, either of a young man or a woman. This place we found later was the Christian church, and on coming down from another direction on our return I found a second body, evidently that of a man, also badly burned, lying just outside the church compound. The odor of burned flesh in the vicinity of the church was sickening.

"We proceeded to the end of the village and climbed the hill, where we found several groups of people huddled under little straw shelters, with a few of their pitiful belongings about them. They were mostly women, some old, others young mothers with babes at breast, but all sunk in the dull apathy of abject misery and despair.

GATHER CHRISTIANS FOR MASSACRE.

"Talking to them in their own language and with sympathy, Mr. Underwood soon won the confidence of several and got the story of what happened from different groups, and in every case these stories tallied in the essential facts. The day before we arrived soldiers came to the village, some time in the early afternoon, and ordered all the male Christians to gather in the church. When they had so gathered, to a number estimated to be 30 by our informers, the soldiers opened fire on them with rifles and then proceeded into the church and finished them off with sword and bayonets. After this they set fire to the church, but as the direction of the wind and the central position of the church prevented the upper houses catching, soldiers fired these houses individually and after a time left.

"As we passed down the ruined village returning to our rickshas we came on the last house of the village, which was standing intact, and entered in conversation with the owner, a very old man. He attributed the safety of his house to its being slightly removed and to a vagary of the wind. He was alive because he was not a Christian and had not been called into the church. The details of his story of the occurrence tallied exactly with the others as to what had happened.

"We found that our ricksha men had followed us, leaving their vehicles on the main road. Their surliness and reserve was gone, and they volunteered the information that, while they were only ricksha men living in the market town, yet they would confirm what the people had told us. Further, they could take us in rickshas to the town of Soo Chon, only a short 10 li (3 miles) away. It undoubtedly had been burned, as we could see for ourselves; many more towns had been burned, they said, in that district, 15 in all that they knew of.

AFRAID TO BURY THEIR DEAD.

"We had seen, heard, and smelled enough to confirm all of the reports that have been trickling into Seoul from native sources in this district; and as we had a perilous road to travel before we reached safety for our heavy car on the main highway, we turned back to the market town, sad and sick at the thought of the miserable people camped on the hillside, afraid even to go to their dead. We were met outside the police station by the officer we had seen on entrance; and, telling that as the rikishas were poor, the road bad, and the afternoon waning, we would return to Seoul at once.

"This particular police office is not connected by telephone or telegraph, and the road is little used, so the surprise of our sudden appearance from Seoul in a large car, coupled with Mr. Curtice's diplomacy, was what gained us the privilege of seeing the result of the military method of repression and of talking to the people without interference. A remarkable fact was that on the journey coming and going to the main highway we met only a couple of natives traveling and very little work in the fields, except in immediate proximity to the houses, the more remote fields lying deserted, which was unusual at this time of the year and at variance with conditions along the main highway."

VISIT OF BRITISH CONSUL.

Under date of April 24, the same correspondent writes:

"The British consul had an interview with the Government after the first trip to Cheamni and mentioned the result of our investigation, at the same time expressing a desire to go down himself with certain of his nationals who were interested in mission work.

"The party in the motor car consisted of Mr. Royds, the British consul; Dr. Hardy, of the Canadian mission; Dr. Gale; myself; and extra chauffeur. In addition to the motor car two motorcycles accompanied us (with side cars) carrying Dr. Noble, who is superintendent of the work in that district; Rev. Cable; Rev. Mr. Billings; Rev. Mr. Beck; and Rev. Mr. Herron Smith, who is in charge of the Japanese work in Korea for the Methodist Church.

"We took a different route, where the bridges were in better condition, and arrived at the market town of Parang-Chang about noon, and parked our machines in front of the police station and proceeded at once through the market town toward Cheamni. There were a number of police in front of the station, but they said nothing to us, but fell in behind and followed us to the burned village, evidently having been warned of our coming.

CLEARING AWAY THE DÉBRIS.

"Here we found a large gang of collies cleaning away the ruins preparatory to having the houses rebuilt. All the burnt bodies had been removed and great haste was being made in cleaning the place up, which was in decided contrast to villages we visited later and which had been destroyed early in the month.

"We photographed freely without interference, but whenever we started to talk to the natives a policeman would saunter up and the Korean would freeze up. Nothing was said to them in our presence, but they were in wholesome fear of what might happen later if they were seen talking to us. However, our party was a large one and we divided up and went in different directions, and those familiar with the language obtained many interviews, and everything confirmed the first report sent you as to the hour and method of assembling the men in the church and exterminating them and then setting fire to the village.

"Careful questioning of some women in a house removed from this village gave the number of Christian men killed as 12, whose names were secured, in addition to which 2 women who went to find out what was happening to their husbands were killed, one a woman over 40 and the other 19. These may have been the bodies we saw outside the church on the first day, this supposition being possible as they were outside the ruins. The remainder of the men killed in the church were members of the Chyong Do Kio and were said to be 25 in number.

OCCUPIED HOUSE FIRED.

"We next started walking to the village of Soo Chon, 3 miles away, which had been the objective of my first visit. We found that this village had been burnt either on the night of the 5th or the morning of the 6th. The story told to our party was that on that night the people were awakened by finding their houses on fire. As soon as they ran out they were struck with swords or bayoneted or shot—none were killed but several wounded, and we found one man whose arm had been laid open with a sword, and who, from lack of attention, would probably die of infection. The British consul afterward obtained a promise from the police in the market town that he should be sent to the hospital at Suigen. In this village a church and about 30 houses had been burnt, but no attempt had been made to clean it up, though it occurred early in the month. We then proceeded to a very small hamlet just over the hill where four or five houses had been burnt.

"As we returned along the road homeward I was somewhat in the rear and a Korean appeared suddenly from a bypath and asked me to go to the village of Kei Rong Kohl, 5 li (1½ miles) away, where 17 out of 19 houses had been burned. This I was unable to do, as it was growing late and our party was well ahead. I overtook a Korean who had been following our party as a spy for the police. He denied knowing of such a place, but finding I knew all about it and could speak the vernacular, he admitted it and confirmed what we had been told regarding Cheamni, particularly the hour, which is very important, for there had been a report among the Japanese of a town being burned through the upsetting of a lamp by Koreans wishing to avoid arrest during the night.

"We were told of a certain place in this district where nine burned villages can be seen from an elevation nearby. We had seen enough to confirm the reports previously received and returned to Seoul.

"The officials in the Government expressed to the consular officials the greatest indignation and surprise at these outrages and promised immediate relief to sufferers.

"A meeting of foreigners was held to see if relief work could be undertaken, and a committee appointed to wait on the officials. Appreciation was expressed by them and the matter is going through official routine. Many officials have visited the district, particularly Cheamni, and in that point I believe active steps for relief are being taken. I think the exposure of what happened at Cheamni will put a stop to this sort of repression."

AN INCIDENT IN NORTH KOREA.

On Sunday afternoon, April 20, 1919, the following occurred at the village of Nong Tuk, Sinkai County, Shanghai Province. The Myen Chang (town magistrate), a Japanese, with two Korean police officers, came to the village from the Myen, about 5 li distant. They went to the house of Song Chang Sik, a local preacher in charge of this circuit, but he and his wife had gone to another church on the circuit for the Easter services. The officers beat his old mother, frightened the seven children, broke the water jars, dishes, and furniture, and destroyed his books. The local leader of this church is a fine young man from a well-to-do family, who had been to the Bible School in Seoul. He had been arrested at another place the 1st of March. The officers went now to his house and beat his old grandfather, cutting a gash in his head. They also beat the teacher of the day school, and smashed up things in other Christian homes. They broke every window in the church, with the lamps and stoves, and took the pulpit, the Bibles, and the hymn books into the church yard, where they burned them. They said such low-down people as the Christians had no right to live, and would all be run out of that region.

There has been no demonstration in this village. None of the Christians here took part in any demonstrations for independence in other places. Some days before, at the Myen (township headquarters), where there are no Christians, there had been a demonstration by the non-Christians, of whom six had been shot to death on the spot and many others wounded.

STORY OF GOVERNMENT SCHOOL GIRL WHO WAS SABERED.

On March 1, 1919, at 2 o'clock, we started at Pagoda Park, going up to the Taihan Gate, where we shouted "Mansei" with all our might. From there we came to Kangwha Gate and shouted again, going out the West Gate to the French consulate and the American consulate, where we once more shouted "Mansei."

Coming in through the little west gate we again went to the Taihan gate, from thence we went to Pan Chung Tong (where there is a police station). There came out mounted gendarmes trying to stop our course, but we pressed forward to the Government general offices, and there the kotang koan (high official) came out with his sword, beating all in his way, and he struck me with his sword on the back, making a wound three inches long. The force of the blow threw me down, after which he stamped on my head with his foot, leaving me senseless for about 20 minutes.

When I came to I arose, to find my tooth broken, nose and lips bruised and cut, and blood everywhere. My shoulder had a 3-inch cut, and my leg, which had been struck several times, was black and blue.

KWAK SAN AND TYUNGJU.

The Kwak San Church was burned yesterday morning (April 25, 1919) and the Christians prevented from going in to put it out. The atrocious tortures of the prisoners in Tyungju are worthy of African savages and barbarians.

PART OF AN EXTENDED REPORT.

A.—Methods of suppression.

APRIL 24, 1919.

The following paragraph can only be a summary of the methods which have been used in the suppression of nationalistic demonstrations. Every statement is supported by signed affidavits deposited with representatives of the United States Government. This must of necessity be a generalization, since conditions varied somewhat in different parts of the country, and the course of events was not always the same.

It must be borne in mind that the demonstrations began without violence of any kind on the part of the Koreans. The movement, as announced, was to be one of peaceful and orderly expression of national opinion, and in the initial public meetings violence was specifically forbidden, and later special notices were circulated cautioning against the use of violence. The demonstrations, involving as they did thousands of people, were remarkable exhibitions of self-control. It is not to be wondered at that later on, when the crowds were enraged by violence of the police and soldiers, there should be retaliation of some sort in a few cases.

At the first outbreak the police seemed nonplussed at the apparently senseless audacity of the cheering demonstrators. It is said that on the first day in some places the police even joked with the crowd. But when the people refused to be permanently dispersed the mood of the officials changed to irritation and anger, and they entered upon a campaign of enraged brutality, police, gendarmes, soldiers, and firemen (armed with pole hooks) kicking, striking, and beating men, women, and children indiscriminately; using gun butts, swords (in the scabbard at first but later bare and bloody), clubs, and freight hooks (inflicting ghastly wounds). As the demonstration continued, swords and bayonets were freely used, and after the first day, as the wave of demonstration spread out through the country districts, soldiers and gendarmes fired on crowds without warning, shooting indiscriminately in the direction of the cheering whenever the cry of "Mansei" was raised, killing and wounding at random. It was inevitable that there should be retaliation. Gendarmerie windows have been broken and gendarmes have been killed. A notable instance was at Morak, where the gendarmes fired into a crowded market, killing several. The crowd pursued the gendarmes and killed four.

In this connection Col. Mayeda, who is second in command of the gendarmes in Chosen, claims that up to March 30 the police reports indicated 38 places in which police and gendarmes had used arms, and that in all these cases the Koreans began violence; that the police and gendarmes were few in number, usually only three or four against hundreds and even thousands of Koreans, and that it was necessary to protect themselves and Government property from destruction. It was his representation that no more violence was used than was necessary. The sufficient answer to this is that in all cases which have come under foreign observation the Korean demonstrators refrained from violence until angered by the wanton cruelty of the police, and that so far from violent measures becoming increasingly necessary recent acts of wholesale slaughter and burning of villages have taken place even after Korean demonstrations had ceased and the crowd dispersed. The police may regard this as punitive; it can not be justified under the plea of necessity or self-defense. Moreover, in every instance where police and foreigners both report on the same cases the police reports are invariably falsified and unreliable. We can therefore place no reliance upon their statements in regard to the course of events elsewhere.

Evidence that the police excuse of Korean attack upon the police station is invalid is found in the fact that in at least one instance the dead Koreans lay in all parts of the city where they fell, none near the gendarmerie, but on the spot where they had been cheering in unresisting groups when fired upon by the gendarmes. There are photographs to substantiate this in the case of Andong, where the dead were reported to be 30, and where a missionary himself counted 7 left lying by the roadside in widely separated parts of the city 14 hours after the shooting.

Official records from March 1 to April 11 show that 9 police and gendarmes have been killed and 109 wounded, while among the Koreans 361 have been killed and 860 wounded. The report of police casualties is doubtless accurate; that of the Korean casualties falls far short of the true figures and only takes cognizance of those officially known to be dead and wounded and does not include those killed and wounded by indiscriminate shooting in the dark down village streets. Individual cases reported in the Government press have totaled more than 600 killed, and these do not include more recent shootings.

The process of arrest at any time of excitements and disturbances is apt to be accompanied with more or less violence. It has been the gratuitous and unjustifiable brutality of officials which has most impressed itself upon observers here. It is not merely the roughing and beating of those who are being arrested, but the actions of those who, without making any attempt at arrest, desperately beat any whom they meet in the road without explanation or inquiry in a general campaign of terrorism. Complaint or remonstrance on the part of Koreans means more severe treatment and even shooting. Japanese civilians have taken part in this work as well, with the encouragement of the police.

A peculiarly revolting feature of police methods is their treatment of women. Their laying violent hands on women is the thing that most often arouses the anger of the Koreans, whose term of execration "barbarians" is called forth by these actions. Women have been stripped and beaten both before and during police examination in police stations, in their own homes, and in the open, usually wantonly subjected to insult and indignity, simply to indulge the brutal propensities of the police or soldiers. The treatment to which educated young women have been subjected appears in appended documents.

Since the coming in of fresh troops and the inauguration of more severe methods of repression, as announced by the Government, increasing numbers of reports come in regarding the violation of women by soldiers. The absence of this form of violence in the past, the sudden appearance of such reports, coincident to the new orders issued, give verisimilitude to the reports, aside from the fact that they come from trustworthy sources. Complaint made to the police in regard to this has been met with beating and with the statement that such charges must not be brought against servants of the Government.

Treatment of the wounded has been most cruel. In many cases they have not been allowed to go to hospitals. Those brought to mission hospitals have often been smuggled in secretly by their friends. Our physicians can testify to the fact that wounded men have been taken out of hospitals and beaten, and that others have been taken out of hospitals to prison before being discharged by the doctors as cured.

At the Mission Hospital in Pyeng Yang the doctors were told that they must not report patients as having died of gunshot wounds, but that they must say they died a natural death.

The jails, of course, overflowed from the first day. Prisoners in most cases received brutal treatment, though there were notable exceptions. Wholesale arrests have followed from the first outbreak. Examinations have been made as rapidly as possible, and considerable numbers have been discharged after detention ranging from one day to six weeks. In some cases girls and women have received considerate treatment in prison, in others quite the reverse; the girls arrested in Seoul complain uniformly of the brutality of the women jailers and police officials. The whole number reported under arrest varies from 10,000 to 40,000.

Trials according to Japanese law have been proceeding throughout the past weeks, the Koreans for the most part making no defense, but asserting their innocence of any other act than an expression of their desire for independence, which they do not disavow. Sentences have been imposed, ranging from six months to three years at hard labor, while in numerous cases flogging (which can not be administered legally to Japanese) has been administered with from 15 to 90 blows.

As was indicated above, firemen armed with clubs and polehooks were in many places given free hand to do what they wished to beat, scatter, and terrorize the crowds; in other places civilians apparently (possibly the reservists) were armed with clubs and hooks and turned loose upon the Koreans. It must be constantly borne in mind that these Korean crowds were unarmed, the people having been disarmed nine years ago.

The police paraded bodies of armed thugs (Japanese in Korean clothing) through the streets to indicate what might be expected. Rumor freely circulated that missionaries were to be beaten by them. Government officials told a newspaper correspondent and an American official that if they carried lighted cigarettes at night they would be safe from molestation, since they would not be mistaken for missionaries, while a missionary was warned by friendly officials to keep off the streets at night. These thugs have since been withdrawn, owing, it is said, to a protest by the American Consul General.

The Korean demonstrations continued for over a month and have now almost entirely ceased. The soldiers in the country districts, however, are increasingly violent, using fire and sword and terrifying the populace.

B.—Government attitude toward the Christian Church in suppressing the revolt.

In speaking of the "Government attitude" we are using an inferential phrase. Officially the Government attitude toward the church is that of religious toleration, and Christians are presumably to receive the same treatment as other citizens involved in the same disturbance. As a matter of fact, however, the Government's real attitude must normally be inferred from the action of the Government's officers and agents, the police, gendarmes, and soldiers.

Ever since Japan first came into control in the peninsula the existence of the Protestant Christian Church has offered a problem to the Government. The reasons are not far to seek; it is primarily the problem which the church from its very beginning offered to autocratic governments. It existed in the days of Rome. It stands out in particular prominence here in Chosen, because here we have an instance where the church is the strongest organization among the people whom the invading nation is seeking to control and denationalize and assimilate.

Dr. A. J. Brown, in his pamphlet on the "Conspiracy case" of 1912 (p. 7), makes the following statement: "The Japanese desire to control everything within their dominions, as foreign business men have learned to their cost. This is particularly true in Korea, where they deem it necessary to their plans to be absolute masters. Now the Japanese see in the Korean Church numerous and powerful organizations which they do not control."

There is a natural solidarity of Christians (especially under our form of church polity) which they themselves have come to appreciate, and which has been an obvious source of anxiety to the Government. The whole attitude of the Government toward the church in this present crisis is largely conditioned by a recognition of this solidarity and unity. A military government without experimental knowledge of Christianity, not appreciating fully its primary spiritual aim nor able to estimate properly the strength of the spiritual forces and factor involved, but fearing them, would naturally view with concern the fact that the largest and most thoroughly organized member of the body politic embraced at the same time the most enlightened and progressive portions of the populations.

Admiral Mahan, in a letter to Dr. Brown, quoted in the pamphlet referred to above, says ("Conspiracy case," p. 21):

"The suspicion excited by Christian gatherings is not only natural but has been characteristic of non-Christian governments from the time of Rome. Sometimes it is well grounded, as in the case of the English Roman Catholics in the days of Elizabeth and James the First. Men bound together by close sympathies of vital religion are in a state very favorable to combination for other objects, as, for instance, patriotic * * *."

The Government apprehension of the power of church organization is clearly witnessed by the encouragement given to the propagation of Christianity by the Congregational Church, which has a form of polity devoid of unity and integration, and therefore easier to control. It is under purely Japanese control.

Presbyterian organization, with its self-government and unity, and Methodist organization, with its unity and its added relation to a foreign ecclesiastical body of great power, are both obnoxious to the Government.

Another reason for the Government's suspicion of the church in Chosen is the fact that foreign influence exercises great power there. (It must be admitted that, while technically autonomous, the native church was dominated for a long period by foreign influence. But the church has rapidly come into its own, in its assemblies being able and ready on occasion to outvote the foreigners, and this very year marked a movement initiated by missionaries, for their actual withdrawal from any other than advisory participation in church assemblies.) The existence of this foreign influence has, beyond question, been an added irritation to the authorities, who felt that it was an obstacle in the way of the Japanization they wished to effect. A former governor general is reported to have said, "We can't have the missionaries here trying to make little Americans out of the Koreans." The remark was not justified, but it indicated sufficiently the official thought.

The immediate effect of the present disturbance, therefore, a disturbance in which Christians have taken a prominent part, has been to confirm and strengthen the suspicion which already existed against Christianity. The fact that it has been in no sense a purely Christian uprising, and the further fact that it was not purely Christian in origin, will not offset the consideration that Christianity has apparently proved itself to be hostile to the Government. This interpretation of Christianity on the part of the Government must be borne in mind as an explanation of the present treatment of the church. Naturally the Government has issued no statement to this effect, but actions of officials speak louder than Government proclamations. The vice governor of Choong Chung Province, a Japanese, and, therefore, the real executive of the Province, called in prominent Koreans, including some Christians, and in a public meeting advised people to have nothing to do with Christianity, which was a Western religion, and not adapted to Orientals. Police officials are urging the same thing everywhere. The procurator, in making his case against Mr. Mowry at the public trial, said: "It is impossible not to suspect Christianity in the matter."

From the very first day of the demonstrations the officials have paid more attention to Christian participation than to that of any other class. Arrests of those actually taking part in demonstrations and made upon the spot were naturally made without discrimination, but in the campaign of general arrests which followed throughout the country, Christians have been singled out for marked discrimination, even before demonstrations have taken place, in many instances.

Throughout the country the police immediately began to arrest pastors, elders, and other church officers. Some of these have been released after weeks of imprisonment and examination. Sentences against others are being daily announced, even in the case of men who took no part in the demonstrations, ranging from six months to three years of penal servitude. Of course no apology is intended for those who took part in the uprising deliberately and expecting the consequences. We are emphasizing the fact of the wholesale arrest and beating of Christians simply because they are Christians. In some places the men and women of the village were called together, all those who admitted they were Christians were maltreated or arrested and the others sent away. Wayfarers met by soldiers and gendarmes are asked whether they are Christians, and beaten and abused on the admission of the fact. Korean Christians remaining in the villages are given all sorts of announcements by local police and gendarmes. They are told that Christianity is to be exterminated, that all Christians are to be shot, that meetings are to be forbidden. It has been stated that Chunt Kyo is to be completely abolished because it is a native religion, but that Christianity, because of its foreign affiliations, while not being abolished, will be reduced by legislative restrictions to half its present size. There is of course no uniformity in these announcements, but they are all evidently part of a campaign of intimidation. That they are not groundless statements is evidenced by the fact that 19 churches have been partly or wholly wrecked by soldiers; bells, furniture, Bibles, and hymn books being smashed or burned. Seven other churches have been burned to the ground. We have no record of churches of other missions involved except as noted below.

The effect of this treatment varies in different localities. In some places worship is entirely suspended, church officers not under arrest are in hiding, and the congregations are scattered. In some places church meetings have been forbidden; in others the services are continued, but with reduced attendance and with police detectives and spies present; in still others the disturbances have had no effect on the congregational gatherings, and many new inquiries are present attracted doubtless by the reputation for patriotism which Christians have acquired. It may be said that the local officials are always ready with some absurd explanation of the distruction of church property such as that the Christians burn their own churches to show their abandonment of Christianity or that non-Christians burn them in hostility to Christians.

Since the bringing in of additional troops from Japan things have grown incredibly worse. These troops were brought in with the avowed purpose of "using severe measures," and interprated in the light of facts this means a campaign of fire and sword and devastation, the burning of whole villages accompanied in some instances with the massacre of inhabitants in the most approved style of Hun and Turk. At present writing attention is centered in a group of villages less than 50 miles from the capital. Two weeks after the first reports of village burning reached Seoul, investigation was made by foreigners. A party went to find the burned villages, and came on one still smoking. It had been burned the day before. At this village, called Chey Am Ni, the soldiers called the village men together in the Methodist Church, about 30 men in a village of 40 houses. Both Christians and non-Christians were present. The soldiers then fired on those present to kill all possible and then burned the church building over the heads of dead and wounded. Six men broke through the wall of the burning building and tried to escape, but were bayoneted outside. Two women who had joined their husbands were shot with the others. The village was then burned to the ground.

The facts are personally attested by representatives from the British and American consulates, members of the Red Cross Society, and of the Patriotic League of Britons Overseas. Photographs were taken of ruins and burned and bayoneted bodies. These outrages had been going on for a period of two weeks and continued in that district till the very day of the unexpected investigation by foreigners. Four other devastated villages in the district have been visited and reports from 11 others have been received. The same thing is being reported from other parts of Korea, and though the reports might have been received with incredulity under other circumstances, nothing is now too horrible to be believed. In all instances the hostility of the soldiers and gendarmes and police is directed against Christians. Christians in districts adjoining the devastated region have been told that the same thing would happen to them, and over large areas the people are sleeping out in the hills without shelter at night because they dare not stay in their villages, which may be burned over their heads at midnight and the inhabitants massacred.

In one village the Christians were ordered to tear down the church building and told that unless they signed an agreement not to be Christians they would be arrested as insurgents. Profession of Christianity is regarded as equivalent to confession of revolutionary purpose.

In a recent issue of an American church magazine is a statement to the effect that "the Japanese have a feeling of respect for Americans akin to worship"! The author of that article should spend a few months in the presence of the servants of the government of Chosen and learn their opinion of everything American and Christian.

In parts of the country where the reign of terror is being maintained people dare not walk from one village to another for fear of being shot, and the men dare not work in the fields. Frightfulness of another kind is employed. Inhabitants of villages are lined up to be shot and then sent away till another day, when the process is repeated. Even though not actually shot, on these occasions the people have the instances of massacre and devastation before their eyes and never know when the threat will be carried into effect. And always the animus is directed against the Christians.

As a result of the publicity given to these nearest outrages, the Government is taking relief measures for the people of these four villages and promises help and farm implements and seed. They are not able to restore the dead farmers to life, however, and nothing would have been done if the foreigners had not raised a storm of indignation. Nothing had been done in the case of villages similarly devastated two weeks before. The Japanese excuse is that the people were called together for instructions and in their efforts to escape kicked ouer a lamp and started the conflagration! Which leaves the massacres unexplained, but is a sample of the average police explanation accepted by the Japanese.

We can not go into further details in this report. The accompanying documents may be examined. But it can not be doubted that a persistent campaign is being carried on against Christianity under the plea of suppressing revolt.

Villifying, beating old men and little children, breaking up meetings by armed officers and men, wholesale arrests, brutal treatment of those under arrest, threats and intimidation, and massacre are all being employed to break the spirit of Christians, and to prevent the spread of Christianity. These statements are supported by photographs, signed statements, and narratives on file.

THE OUTLOOK.

APRIL 24, 1919.

The uncertainty as to the outcome of the present disturbances is increased by the fact that the government of Chosen finds critics of the administration in the ranks of its own civil officials and in the Liberal parties in the Imperial Government. Investigators are not slow to criticize what they characterize as the stupid policy of the military régime, while the leading journals of Japan are to the extent of their meager information joining in a protest. The Peninsular Magazine, a monthly published in Seoul by a Japanese but for the Koreans and in the Korean language, had its April number confiscated, further publication prohibited, and the editor arrested because it published a long editorial criticizing the governor general's handling of the situation.

Except for rumors to the effect that the student class in Japan are beginning to favor Korean liberty, there is, of course, no one among the Japanese who favors independence for the Koreans, though the more advanced, like Viscount Kato, have come out in favor of autonomy; but many of them feel that the military administration ought to give place to the civil in the future, and that the military administration has made a failure in their colonial policy. As intimated above, right-minded Japanese in Japan proper do not approve of the Government's extreme methods in Chosen and are asking for a change.

It is possible that government reform may take place. A recent statement of Mr. Yamagata, the administrator general, is to the effect that "the agitation is deplorable, coming as it does just on the eve of government reforms" (the bold face is ours). But all officials seem to agree that the present uprising must be crushed before any reforms can be instituted, while the interpellations in the Diet in regard to the Korean situation seem to be a criticism of the administration for failing to keep order in the peninsula rather than a suggestion that the underlying causes of the disturbance be discovered and removed.

We must recognize that democratic tendencies are manifest in the Japanese Empire as well as in the rest of the world, and momentous events may occur at any time, even before this report reaches the board. Only the day before yesterday two automobile loads of Japanese rushed through the streets of Seoul shouting "Democracy banzai." Some 60 arrests have been made in connection with the demonstration. Many and conflicting forces are at work to-day in Japan as well as Korea; but we must not forget the most obvious fact that unless there is some marked change in Government policy or in the character of the administration, or both, mission work in Chosen faces a period of great limitation and difficulty. There are grave problems ahead.

The administrator general has just recently returned from a trip to Tokyo. It had been hoped that his return would mark the announcement of conciliatory measures; but, on the contrary, the official announcement is to the effect that the "lenient" measures employed in the past will be exchanged for utmost rigor, and a new law has been promulgated by the governor general making "any disturbance of the peace with a view to effecting a change of government" an offense punishable with 10 years of penal servitude, and significantly and specifically including foreigners in the ruling.

The effect of the administration's Rehoboam policy at this time can only be conjectured, but there are those who feel justified in quoting a trite proverb to the effect that "whom the gods would destroy they first make mad."

A PERSONAL LETTER.

MY DEAR MR. ———: I hardly know what to write. Things terribly upset these days. The country is still in the throes of revolution. The missionaries and Christians are suffering much. The Japanese as a nation do not like Christianity—it is too democratic. One of our missionaries is in jail. Things are in bad shape. I myself am on the "black list" because of an article to the ——— Press. The editor nearly had his paper suppressed over it, and the Government said they might need him later on. You see all papers in Japan and Korea are under Government control.

The poor Koreans are suffering terribly. I suppose fully 6,000 have been killed and thousands beaten—60 to 90 cuts with a brutal rod. All they have done is to shout "Long live Korea!" In some places there has been violence, throwing of stones, etc., but not at first. The Government up to the present has not done a thing but shoot and maim them. Of course it has told them to stop, but in no way has it come in touch with the leaders to see what could be done to stop this awful affair. I am in disfavor because I have told Government officials (and my article) that I believed in advanced reforms. I do not believe in immediate independence.

I am sending this letter via Shanghai. Nothing can get out like this these days. Remember the trouble is we are under the heel of a militaristic Government, exactly like the German. I was caught by some soldiers on Sunday. They soon let me go. I was going to see a man who had been badly beaten by the police. It is all your life's worth to go into the country these days. Oh, Japan is cruel! Even the best Japanese Christians, of course, back their Empire. I know Japan now. Nationally aggressive, obtaining her ends at all costs; if Christianity and love suit her, they are used; if the foulest methods of Machiavelli are required, they are employed, and all is covered with a smiling lie. I know her, but it took me two years.

A PERSONAL LETTER.

APRIL 30, 1919.

DEAR MR. ———: Things are quiet in ———, but there are still disturbances elsewhere. Nearly every day we see batches of prisoners from the country being brought to ——— for examination. Numerous churches have been burned by the military. The northern Presbyterians report at least seven church structures and a large school destroyed in this way, and we know that the southern Methodist and other missions have had similar losses. The students in the higher schools have not returned to study so far. A number of our students in both colleges with which I am connected are still imprisoned.

A terrible thing happened at ——— about ——— miles from ———. In a village there the men were ordered by the soldiers to go to the church on a Tuesday afternoon. About a dozen Christians and some twenty members of the Chundokyo responded. When they were in the church the soldiers fired through the windows, killing and wounding the party. Then the church was set on fire. The flames set one-half of the village on fire, and the soldiers then set fire to the other half. All but three houses were destroyed. It is claimed that this was done in retaliation for the killing of a gendarme, but so far as we can find out the gendarme was killed at quite a distance from this particular settlement. We have heard that the authorities have called the perpetrators to task, and have started in to rebuild the village as reparation.

A PERSONAL LETTER.

TOKYO, April 23, 1919.

DEAR MR. ———: Mr. Mowry was arrested on April 4, and was detained in prison until the 19th instant, when he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment at hard labor, but was released on bail, pending the hearing of the appeal trial. The charge against Mr. Mowry was that of sheltering five Korean "criminals," and of allowing them to prepare seditious literature on his or on Dr. Moffett's premises. One of these Koreans was Mr. Mowry's secretary, and all the others, I think, were student friends, one of them being a son of Rev. Kil Sun Choo, of Pyengyang, who was one of the signers of the independence manifesto. At the trial Mr. Mowry admitted that these five men had each of them slept in his home on certain nights, but denied that he knew that the police were searching for them or that he knew that they were fleeing from the police, although he said he suspected it in regard to some of them. It might be said that Mr. Mowry has for years been in the habit of entertaining Korean friends—students and others—in his home in this way, and had entertained some of these men before. Mowry stated, however, that the police had not notified anyone that they were searching for these men, and that he did not think it was wrong or would have been wrong unless he had known that the police did want them. Also it should be borne in mind that the mere fact that a man is a Christian Korean is sufficient these days to lead the police to desire to arrest and investigate him.

The trial came off on April 15, no notice having been given either Mr. Mowry or Dr. Moffett, who was endeavoring to keep in touch with the case, until 2 p. m. of the 14th, when it was too late to secure a lawyer, as the nearest available lawyer lives in Seoul, and the trial was to take place at 10 a. m. on the 15th. So the case went to trial without a lawyer. The public procurator asked for a sentence as above—the law allowing up to two years' imprisonment or a fine of yen 200. The judge took the case under advisement until the 19th and then pronounced judgment as asked by the procurator. By this time Dr. Moffett had engaged a Mr. Okobo to represent Mr. Mowry, and an appeal was filed and granted, and Mr. Mowry was released on yen 300 bail.

In the meantime, over here in Japan, Mr. ——— and I had been trying to engage Dr. F. Usawa, who was in charge of "the Conspiracy Case" with Dr. Hanai. On April 10 Mr. ——— left Tokyo for Nagasaki, where Dr. Usawa was engaged on a case, and there made a tentative arrangement with him. These two lawyers are said to be the best criminal lawyers in Japan, and Dr. Usawa, as you know, is a Christian, a member of Mr. Uemura's church. Dr. Usawa returned to Tokyo on the 15th, and I met him on that day and again on the 22d, yesterday, on his return from another case. At this second interview I, acting on instructions from Chosen, definitely engaged Dr. Usawa to take charge of the case—in company with Mr. Okobo. Dr. Usawa thinks that he will be able to go to Chosen before the middle of May, and yesterday telegraphed to Mr. Okobo to try to get the case fixed for May 12. I also urged Dr. Usawa to go as soon as possible and stay as long as he could, because he ought to see for himself the conditions in the country. I had a very frank talk with him and told him some of the happenings we had witnessed personally. He said he would go to Chosen with an open mind and see all he could.

Mr. ———, after he met Dr. Usawa in Nagasaki, crossed over to Chosen. I, however, because it was necessary for some one to stay to perfect arrangements with Dr. Usawa, and also because Mr. F. L. Brown is due here soon to make arrangements for the Tokyo World's Sunday School Convention, stayed on. At first it seemed that every avenue of approach to influential Japanese was blocked. However, within the last week a good many facts as to the real condition of affairs in Korea have begun to come out even in Japan, as the inclosed clipping from the Japan Advertiser will indicate. This has led to a suspicion on the part of many influential Japanese that the censorship has prevented the real state of affairs from being known; and it having been reported that missionaries from Korea are in Tokyo, I am beginning to receive invitations from a number of such men to meet them and tell them what the situation is from our viewpoint. This I am doing, because it is the only means we have of bettering the terrible situation now obtaining. Already the Federated Council of Churches had decided to send two men to Chosen, one of whom is Mr. ——; the other is not decided. Also ——— and Dr. ——— have asked me to meet them on the 25th to talk over the situation, and they say that they too will probably send over a delegation, some of whom will be members of the Diet. There are a good many encouraging signs that a change in public opinion in Japan, which has been fed with falsified reports, may be brought about.

APRIL 26, 1919.

Yesterday, as indicated above, I met Baron ——— and Dr. ———. There were present also Mr. ———, of the Japan Peace Society, and Mr. ———. We talked about two hours, and I told them very frankly just what is occurring in Chosen. They were interested to the end and said that they felt that a delegation of prominent Japanese outside of Government circles should be sent over. Mr. ——— and I urged them to send this delegation as soon as possible. These two gentlemen were absolutely in ignorance of what is being done in Korea, and I think the conference did good. This morning I met Mr. ——— and talked with him for about an hour. His sympathies are wholly with the Koreans in their desire for greater liberties. He urged three things: First, that we should give the facts to the world. He said the Government would probably resent the publication of the facts, but that it was the only way to remedy the situation. Second, in connection with the publication of these facts, let the newspapers of New York, Paris, and London point out that this situation has been brought about by the military régime, and let them urge Japan to change it. Third, that, if possible, the American and British Governments ought to be approached to get them to bring pressure on Japan to change her policy in this respect. He urged me to speak to ———. In all these conferences we have declined to speak about the political side of the question and have tried to make very plain that we are not taking any part in that, but also we try to make very plain that we feel that we do have a right to speak of the humanitarian side.

I feel repaid for coming for another reason also—I have met so many just and fair-minded Japanese that I am forming a juster estimate of their character as a whole. If Japan could only throw off militarism, there would be great hope for her.

APRIL 30, 1919.

Since writing you on the 23d and 26th, events have taken place rapidly. The first is the admission by Count Hasegawa that atrocities have occurred in Chosen. I send you among other things two extracts from the Japan Advertiser, one under date of April 27 and one under date of April 29, which will be self-explanatory. All I would say in addition to the information that these articles contain is that such happenings have occurred in many other places in Chosen, according to reports which have been brought to us by trustworthy Koreans. I inclose an account of one that is said to have occurred in the town of Maingsan, which is about 110 miles north of Pyengyang—we have a Christian church there, and the report was brought to us by a Bible woman whom we know well and who is trustworthy. These are but examples, though the worst ones of which we know. On a smaller scale, however, the same thing has happened in numberless villages.

I have made some progress in the way of meeting influential Japanese and laying before them the true situation in Chosen. And I am greatly encouraged to find that they are as indignant and as horrified as anyone else when they do know the facts.

KOBE, May 17, 1919.

Our interview with an important member of the Government was at once more interesting and satisfactory. His attitude was most cordial and receptive, and though, of course, his official position made it impossible for him to give detailed statements regarding the Government's policy, he indicated with great clearness what that policy was regarding Chosen. The interview began by a statement on our part of our reasons for the belief that in suppressing the agitation in Korea a disproportionate amount of repression was being directed against Christianity; to a statement of what appeared to us to be some of the underlying reasons why Christians had taken part in the movement and a statement of our apprehension regarding the future of Christian work in Korea. Mr. ——— replied to the effect that the Government had no intention of discriminating between Christians and non-Christians, but while there was some reason to believe that Christians had been particularly involved, there were misunderstandings on both sides. He said the Government had been on the point of making reforms when the trouble broke out in Korea, and therefore there was nothing else to do but suppress it, after which the Government proposed to make definite reforms, which he was not at liberty to state in detail. He said the Government has no anti-Christian bias, but that lower officials often fail to convey the Government's ideas and to carry out orders in the proper manner. After quiet is restored mistaken and overzealous officials will be punished. He said that Koreans must be treated in every way as equals, with all rights accorded Japanese in the home country, but that this ideal could not be realized in "one jump." Korea is not like Egypt and India. There the British are governing aliens. Here Koreans and Japanese are of one stock originally, and must ultimately be accorded similarity of treatment. There is racial discrimination all over the world, even in Paris. It can not be wiped out at one sweep. He said furthermore that there must be no difference in education between Japanese and Koreans. Perhaps his most important and significant statement, the bearing of which upon our troublesome educational problem of the past few years you will at once recognize, was to the effect that private schools in Chosen ought to have as complete liberty to teach religion and the Bible as they do in Japan proper. He is, therefore, evidently opposed to the policy of the Korean administration, against which our mission has been holding out consistently since the new educational ordinances were promulgated. He said in conclusion that religion should be as free in Korea as in Japan proper, and authorized us to tell the Koreans that real reforms would be made. We regretfully pointed out to him that the Koreans would not credit the statement, even coming from us, and did not commit ourselves to any course of action. As in the case of ——— (another important member of the Government), we expressed our earnest hope that the degree of liberty which he evidently favored might soon be realized, and we left with him a copy of the document outlining some of the reasons of the present agitation, a copy of which was forwarded to you in my last letter.

You will be interested to know that the council of federated churches of Japan is sending two Japanese pastors in company with Mr. Gilbert Bowles, of the Friends' mission, to Korea to get some first-hand information. These gentlemen expect to arrive in Seoul about the 21st of May.

Since arriving in Kobe we have learned that in spite of Gov. Gen. Hasagawa's assurance on April 27 that atrocities would stop, and also in spite of the above statement that the Government has no anti-Christian bias, the burning of churches still continues. Whether or not the Government has an anti-Christian bias we are convinced that the acts of its servants show a distinct and vicious bias against Christianity.

EXHIBIT XXX.

A PERSONAL LETTER.

APRIL 30, 1919.

DEAR FATHER: I want to send you a sort of estimate of the situation, which may help you to correct any opinions that have been wrong. The telegraphic news from ——— has not always been reliable, and it may be that many wild rumors have gone out.

In regard to missionaries participating in the independence uprising there is not the slightest truth. We have not even known what was being done till after the events were pulled off in most cases. We have had a great many men come to us for advice as to how they should act as church officers under such a situation, and all that we have done has been to talk frankly of our nonparticipation in the matter, of the danger of the destruction of the church in the movement, and of the large chance that there is very small hope that their appeal for independence will ever accomplish anything but loss of life and the tightening of the oppression. The fact that the pastors so largely went into the movement as leaders looks to the officials as though we were back of it somehow, but that simply illustrates the well-organized channels of influence that we have created in the machinery and life of the Christian community. This church organization was not at all used officially, as far as I have heard. I have not heard of a single case where the officers of the church have used their office or the regular meetings of the church for political propaganda. None the less, the mutual confidence and acquaintance of Christians all over the country have offered the strongest and most effective channel of political effort after the independence movement won the confidence of the Christian leaders. The names of Pastor ———, of———, and of ———, of ———, of the original manifesto, did more to turn the hearts of the Christians all over the country to the movement than anything else. Their influence is ignored by the officials and missionary influence is suspected instead. It is a Korean movement in method, in spirit, and in management.

That the Christian church is right in the midst of the movement no one will deny. The fact that a very large number of our most influential pastors, elders, students, and prominent Christians are in prison now is clear proof that they have been making their influence felt. It is evident that the Christians are the only ones sufficiently in touch with the international situation to realize that the principle of the self-determination of small nations could be applied to their case at this strategic time. The idea that appeal and protest and noise are as powerful as guns would never have swept the country if the Christians were not what they are. The Christians are the only ones who have not been intimidated to the extermination of all hope. Our Christians have felt that our presence was an influence which would compel justice. The Christian community contains men able to do things on a large scale and ready to go forward if the way is opened. The church is strongest along the Manchurian border Provinces, and thus most quickly reached by the influences of the political agitators who have taken refuge in China. So all these things have combined to put Christian leaders in the lead in this independence movement. But they have gone into it without the knowledge of the mission body, even their nearest individual missionary coworkers being left in the dark till after the demonstrations were under way. No missionary would have had the faith or foolhardiness to attack one of the strongest military powers in the world without a sword or a gun or any financial backing, or trustworthy political friends. The Koreans have evidently made up their minds that they would rather die than go on as they are, and so they are committing suicide on Japan's doorstep in protest, in proper oriental fashion. "Self-determination or self-extermination" is the spirit of the movement.

As to the extent of the movement there are two possible views. The uprisings have occurred day and night. Market days, especially where there were thousands of people assembled and arrest was most difficult, were especially used. Schoolboys all over the land have struck, and only those whom the police can lay absolute hands on have been induced to return to their books, and then their work has been largely pretense. Great sections of farmers have refused to sow crops. Merchants have refused to open their shops till forced to do so day after day at the point of the bayonet. As communications are cut off we can not be sure as to what is going on now, but the streams of prisoners that come in day by day now, after two months of incessant uprisings would indicate that every little hamlet is involved more or less. Usually the method has been for the villages of a township to send in all their younger men to a central market on a day fixed, and there, all together, they have gone to the official offices and shouted their throats sore, saying "Mansay for Korea." Every Province and most of the large market places throughout the whole land have had their demonstration. High and low, rich and poor, Christian, Buddhist, and Confucian, church schools and Japanese public schools without distinction, have gone into the demonstrations, willingly facing death or imprisonment, or beating, sheltering neither themselves nor their families—all in hopes that somehow the voice of the oppressed would reach the ear of a merciful God and gain the help of a world newly dedicated to the cause of liberty and justice.

The means used to suppress the revolt have been unmerciful. In fact, the movement has probably reached its present proportions largely because of cruel methods of officials in their attempt to crush it. "Frightfulness" is the proper word to describe much that has taken place. Arrests have been made, with beating with clubs, swords, guns, fists, and whips. Where the crowds seemed too threatening they have been dispersed by shooting promiscuously into the crowds without reference to guilt or nonguilt. After arrest the treatment has been cruel. Trials have been run so nominally and official beating administered with little care as to whether the men beaten were the men who were in the demonstrations or not. All were in sympathy, no doubt, and it has been on this supposition that this indiscriminate punishment has been so freely administered, but it is not just to punish a man for what he has not done. Old men have been laid hold on and beaten in substitution for their sons and grandsons and for neighbors who were leaders but fled and have avoided arrest. Wives have been thus beaten and cast into prison to compel them to produce their husbands. Many farmers have been told that they would be beaten and released, so that they could go back to their farming. But they have often been given 90 strokes with such cruelty that they have had to be carried home in stretchers. Tales of rape are now coming in frequently. Torture to extract information seems common. How many have been killed outright no one can estimate. There have been many in this district. Most of our Christian leaders seem to have been imprisoned before the shooting was resorted to. The only Christian killed here in this city was killed by kicks on the back of the neck during the process of arrest. His funeral was the biggest that this city has ever seen and the non-Christian community joined with the Christians in singing gospel songs as they went along, guarded by a heavy military escort. None of our churches in this Province have been burned, but there are undeniable testimonies of the burning of large churches in various districts of the north of here. One well authenticated case of barbarism was in ————, where 20 or 25 Christians were shut up in their church, shot down first, and then burned up in their building. This was done, it is claimed, by the new soldiers who have recently arrived. A Korean woman would rather die than expose her naked body in ways not conformable to local custom. But it seems to be the common delight of official depravity just now to humiliate our Christian women by stripping them and beating them while naked. This may be claimed to be merely a process of searching their persons, but the effect is maddening on the Korean masses.

The evident attempt on the part of some officials and most of the semiofficial press to put the blame for this trouble on the missionaries has taken various forms and had several results. The arrest of Mr. ———— has aroused sympathy all over the country. The most reserved sections of the old ———— communities have been touched by this as perhaps by nothing that has ever happened. They know what missionaries do, and such persecution in connection with their patriotic movement for independence has given an open door where we have never had welcome. Missionaries have been beaten and treated in humiliating ways frequently. The press is full of ridicule because of what they pretend to think has been the gross mistake of the American missionaries in leading the Koreans into this strife and bloodshed when even a fool would have had better sense. But, as might be expected, such articles don't fool the men who are putting the demonstrations through. The true position of the missionaries is probably more of a matter of discussion over the nation than ever before and all to the good of the cause we represent. It looks now as though the biggest kind of a landslide were headed toward the church. Of course, this is largely political, but the nation knows now what Christianity and the church are, and most of those who are coming in are ready for both the patriotic leadership of their Christian brethren and also for the full religious life which they have for years known to be the only true way of life, but have refused for various reasons. Reports of church attendance doubling in various places are more and more frequent right in the midst of the most distressing police surveillance. Some churches, where all the leaders are in prison, are practically closed, but in general the work of the Gospel is going right on, even though it has been impossible for missionaries to go to them. In one place a policeman was intrusted with the task of searching the churches of a district. He went about instructing the population that now is the time that all should become Christians. Another story which came yesterday, also, is that at one of the near-by demonstrations where a policeman, Korean, was given a gun by a Japanese gendarme and ordered to shoot, he shot into the air until ordered to use the gun as a club. He rushed madly toward a defenseless and harmless old grandmother with uplifted gun and brought it down with a crash on the stone wall at her side. The gunstock was splintered and the gun a wreck.

The question as to whether the uprising is justifiable or not may be questioned by some. All agree that the Japanese have given the Koreans such an awakening in the last 10 years as they would not have attained in a hundred all by themselves. A reliable, clean government, better commercial enterprises, railways, and auto roads, mail service and telegraph, newspapers and public schools, courts of justice and reliable laws, have been given Korea in a day by Japan. But the missionary enterprise and the Japanese invasion have united in awakening the nation, and now the time comes when they refuse taxation without representation, object to search of their homes and persons by any common police, protest against being beaten without trial, having their lands seized by the Government without compensation for the building of good roads, resent having the so-called reliable, clean Government break down wherever Japanese interests are involved; they abominate the system of public prosecution forced upon their every community by the semiofficial organization that is undermining the chastity of the nation. Their mail is searched and seized at any small pretense. Commercial enterprise is flourishing, but under such conditions as to render Koreans hopelessly the commercial slaves of the Japanese overlords. Competition on a fair basis seems impossible. Public schools are very few. They have changed textbooks so that Korean children are taught history which lauds Japan and ignores the ancient glories of Korea. Fathers clench their fists as they complain that they are compelled to send their children to Japanese schools to learn in a hated language things that they hold to be lies. Christian and non-Christian schools have been crushed, and the Bible ordered out of mission schools even. Newspapers are filled with stuff that has been concocted and censored by the Government till one wonders that manhood could so desert an editor. How can any intelligent human being so garble facts in their papers, while admitting that they do so at the order of the powers that be? New roads are good, but the Koreans, who have built them without proper remuneration at the point of a sword in great gangs of forced labor, do not appreciate them.

Koreans justly feel outraged that Japan limits their right to have good schools of higher than high-school grade, and then refuses to let their best sons go abroad to get an education, except a limited number who are kept under Japanese tutelage in Tokyo. Japanese salaries for men in the same work throughout the whole Government system are twice what Koreans get. And yet it is the Koreans who pay the taxes. The progress is fine and the ship rides high on the wave, but it has become unbearable to the galley slaves in the hold.

A PERSONAL LETTER.

APRIL 30, 1919.

MY DEAR DR. ————: No new village burnings in this locality recently, and the Government is doing some relief work for the worst cases here now. A committee representing all westerners living in Seoul met yesterday, and has called a mass meeting of all foreigners for to-morrow at the United States consulate general to plan for supplementing the Government aid. They have rice, and not a spoon with which to eat it, or a dish in which to cook it; no bedding, no clothes but those in which they stood when the massacre took place, and they fled from the burning houses as they were. It makes your blood boil! The church at ———— (better not give the name), in north P. Y., was burned the other night, and the Christians were not allowed to try to put out the fire. Ten thousand dollars would not replace it. "How long, O Lord, how long?"

No school for us this spring, but I have enough to do. More soldiers here in Seoul, garrisoning the city itself, though there has been no violence or even shouting here for weeks.

To-day's Seoul Press reports that a Korean was sentenced to five years' penal servitude for leading a band of agitators and throwing stones at a police box on March 26. That means that the new law imposing imprisonment for 10 years for disturbing public order, a copy of which you have, is retroactive. When the new law was promulgated on April 15 no date was given from which it took effect. But it was stated then that under the existing laws the maximum penalty was two years, so we conclude that it is the plan to apply the new law to cases that are now in the courts.

The Korean Church is standing up well. A famous old chap, Mr. ————, was being examined the other day, and when they asked him what should be done to make things peaceful, he said: "All you Japanese should begin by becoming Christians; then get a new start." I will not soil my paper with their answer, but he went back to his cell in the jail happy because he had spoken "a good word for Jesus Christ." They are not beating him, I am glad to say, but he is a rare exception.

Hastily,

———— ————.

EXHIBIT XXXII.

THE FAILURE OF JAPANESE IMPERIALISM IN KOREA.

(By a Britisher.)

On March 1 of this year there was initiated in Korea a remarkable revolution; remarkable not only because of its severe indictment of Japanese imperial rule, but also because of the nature and methods of the revolution itself. Despite the superinquisitiveness of the Japanese police this people of 20,000,000 souls rose spontaneously within a few days, and took the Japanese officials unawares. Their "independence manifesto" was circulated in the near-by districts by carriers, but in outlying places was posted Japanese mail and on hand for the day of the demonstration. The method followed was that of passive resistance. No violence was resorted to. Throughout the length and breadth of the land the people contented themselves with speeches in favor of independence, with waving of Korean flags of the old régime, and with shouts of "Mansai."

The 33 men whose signatures were affixed to the manifesto gathered in Seoul on the 1st, read their manifesto, and, after celebrating the event by a dinner, calmly telephoned the Japanese police and offered themselves for arrest. The police, marveling, assented, but soon found that they had a heavier task ahead of them, as reports were flashed by wire from the Provinces, telling of demonstrations in all the large centers. The avowed aim of the demonstration was to protest against Japanese rule and acquaint the world at large of the Korean nation-wide desire for political independence. The Japanese authorities, taken absolutely by surprise, could think of no method of suppression than military force, and for several days the soldiery ran amuck, creating great havoc. But the Koreans, true to their prearranged plan, bore it all with stoic fortitude and only in very exceptional circumstances retaliated in kind. The rancor which such uncalled-for severity engendered in the minds of the Koreans was not likely to be softened by the governor general's proclamation, in which he declared that "Japan and Korea are perfectly united into one great power—a power which constitutes one of the principal factors in the league of nations," and in which he appealed to all Koreans to "exert themselves for the harmonious unification and coordination of the two in order to participate in the great work of humanity and righteousness as one of the leading powers of the world."

Here, then, is a new thing under the sun—a passive revolution—remarkable enough for thinking men to take notice of. At this time, when the two great Anglo-Saxon peoples are standing together for the principles of liberty and nationalism, for treaty obligations, and the rights of small nations safeguarded therein, for a pacific as against a military rule, 20,000,000 Koreans make their sober appeal on these very points, and especially to these two nations. Their independent national life was throttled by Japan 10 years ago, despite the fact that it had been guaranteed by treaty. During 10 years they have been under the heel of a military government, which has destroyed all initiative, and which her well-wishers feared has almost driven out all hope of her ever regaining a place in the sun. The Japanese had excuse for believing that their policy of military rule and imperial education had finally succeeded in crushing all national aspiration. But surely not even the most sanguine of Japanese statesmen could deceive himself into believing that "Japan and Korea are perfectly united into one great nation." Union is a matter of soul, and the soulless administration of the Japanese in Korea has only forced Korea to keep her soul apart in sullen unforgetfulness.

Korea can not forget her history. She can not forget that for nearly 4,000 years she has been a self-governing State. It is true that she was long tributary to China, and received most of her civilization from this great center of eastern culture. But she prides herself that throughout it all she maintained her autonomy. She cherishes the memory of those generals who succeeded in defeating great China, and does not forget the progress in art and science which she made independently before her devotion to Chinese culture stultified her own native genius. It is natural enough, too, for her to remember that Japan received much of her civilization from the common Chinese source through the medium of Korea. It was a Korean scholar who first taught Japan the Chinese classics. Korean priests carried to Japan her national Buddhist religion. It is believed, too, that the Japanese official dress was fashioned upon Korean models. And there is no question that the skill of the Japanese potter was directly borrowed from old Korea.

For several centuries Korea had lagged behind her two great neighbors. Her officials were selfish despots, who crushed the people, and by their system of suppression and extortion put a premium on ignorance and incompetence. The young Korean refers to this period with a keen sense of shame, but also with suppressed resentment that the sins of a past age should be added upon him. His resentment is the more unfeigned when he considers that the autonomy she maintained through 4,000 years—an autonomy that even great China respected—should at last have been wrested from her by the nation that drew much of its ancient civilization through her medium and whose modernism is only a few decades in advance of her own.

The events that led to annexation are well known. The Chino-Japanese War left Japan mistress of the East, and for her own safety she demanded that Korea should maintain absolute neutrality and be relieved of her annual tribute to China. Danger arose, however, from another source, for Russia pushed her political influence too far south for Japan's peace of mind. The result was the Russo-Japanese War for the avowed purpose of maintaining Korean independence. The outcome, however, was a Japanese protectorate over Korea, with the transfer to Japan of Korea's foreign relations. A secret protest against Japanese interference made by the Emperor of Korea to The Hague Conference in 1907 led to the dethronement of the reigning monarch and the tightening of the chain about Korea. The assassination of Prince Ito in Harbin by a Korean and repeated revolts in the peninsula finally gave Japan the excuse for annexation in 1910. It was done on a plea of necessity. Korea was the eastern core of contention, and so long as she remained independent and so ill fitted to govern herself, the peace of the East was threatened. So Japan, in the flush of her victory over a European power, became the guardian of the peace of the East and inaugurated her assumption of the new rôle by the annexation of Korea. During the 10 years that have intervened she has successfully preserved the peace, but only, to use a homely simile, as a housewife preserves her summer fruit. She plucks it from its living stem and, adding enough sugar to keep it sweet throughout its captivity, corks it firmly down to keep it from external influences. It looks good enough and promised well enough for the prospective consumer, but once the top is off the ferment begins. Japan made no mean showing in the bottling-up process, nor did she stint the sugar. But there was never a shadow of doubt who the ultimate consumer should be. And now that the lid has sprung for a season, the ferment has already begun.

The administration of Japan in Korea has much to its credit. She has been jealous of the world's approval, and for nine years the governor general has issued a well-got-up annual report in English on reforms and progress in Korea. Each year there has been found material for publication. Japan has instituted and carried out very successfully a progressive program of improvement. Highways, railways, harbors, and communications, these have increaseed in number and efficiency sufficient to merit the gratitude of the native and the praise of the outsider. Abuses in the local administration, in the collection of taxes, and in the law courts have been remedied. Agriculture, trade, and industry have been encouraged. The number of hospitals has been increased and the police hygienic regulations have improved sanitary conditions. The educational system has been extended and made uniform. Finance has been placed on a more stable basis and abuses in the currency rectified. These and such like reforms have compelled the Korean to thankfully acknowledge his debt to Japan.

But there are other aspects of the Japanese administration that tempt the patriotic Korean to greater thankfulness, inasmuch as they have forced Korea to still nurture beneath a mask of political indifference a hatred of Japan and a national aspiration which has burst forth at the first shadow of an opportunity. Military occupation and military government and the evident purpose of the administration to exploit Korea for the benefit of Japan and the Japanese settler—these rankle in the sensitive Korean mind and force him to fix his hope upon "the day" when his "national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction." The military rule has not left him even the vestige of liberty. Every man's movements are under the inquisitorial scrutiny of police and gendarme. All public meetings and society organizations are governed by law. A meeting to discuss world events is an impossibility; a democratic remark would inevitably mean a clash with officialdom. Free speech is unknown. Two years ago three students of the Pyengyang Union Christian College were arrested for making some liberal remarks in a valedictory address, and the literary society of that college was forced to discontinue. It goes without saying that the press is muzzled. No progressive young Korean can find a medium for the expression of his ideas. One of the brightest of young Koreans, Mr. ———, is credited with having edited no less than five magazines, one after the other of which have been suppressed. He is now in prison on the charge of having written the recent independence manifesto. Of magazines run by Koreans, there are no more than one or two in Korea proper, and some four or five issued by college students in Japan. Newspapers in Korea are all edited by Japanese, and even in the case of Christian Messenger, the Korean editor is forbidden to publish paragraphs on world events.

Religious freedom is guaranteed by the Japanese constitution and secured for Korea by the treaty of annexation. It is perhaps only due to the faults inherent in a military system that subordinate officials tend to interfere even here. But interfere they do, particularly in the country districts. The administration encourages Buddhism as the national religion, and the outcry against Christians and the Christian missionaries which followed the present revolt is symptomatic of a deep-seated prejudice. At the present time all Christians are under suspicion, and non-Christians recognize that a profession of Christianity is tantamount to courting official disfavor.

The self-interestedness of the Imperial Japanese rule in Korea is well exemplified in the educational system. A study of it discovers three determining principles: (1) Koreans shall be converted into Japanese, (2) emphasis shall be laid upon a technical education, but (3) Koreans shall not be intrusted with a liberal higher education. In order to accomplish the first of those aims, the chief subject of study in the common-school curriculum is the Japanese language. Not only is there more time given to this subject than to any other two subjects together, but every other subject is taught through the medium of this language except the Korean script. This subject is given no more than two periods every second day, so that if the Korean child still understands his native tongue it is despite his education. Korean history is banned. In its place is a history of Japan with Korean history interspersed here and there, much as colonial history is mentioned in a school history of England. Japanese patriotic songs are meant to cultivate the national spirit. A sense of Japan's military prowess is duly impressed upon the youthful minds by the full regalia—even to the sword—of his Japanese teachers. The second aim of laying emphasis upon a technical education can, of itself, do no harm. The Koreans sorely need to be taught the dignity of labor. But standing, as it does, as the sole purely educational aim, it inevitably gives the Korean the idea that Japan wishes to make him the hewer of wood and the drawer of water. To win unqualified praise such education must go hand in hand with a higher grade general education. But it is just here that the educational system of Korea is chiefly defective. It is in the interest of the Japanese imperial idea that Korea should be kept ignorant of modern events, and the authorities are afraid of a thoroughgoing liberal education. Other than the three special colleges, one each of law, medicine, and technical, there are neither academies, colleges, nor a university provided by the government in Korea. The academies that existed before annexation have been abolished and replaced by "higher common schools" of a much lower standard.

Not only is it in the system of education that the Koreans criticize the administration but in the inadequacy of the number of schools provided for the population, and especially in view of the discrimination in this respect made in favor of the Japanese residents in Korea. The following table will show the statistics for the year 1916 as published in the governor general's annual report, together with a comparative statement of Protestant mission schools:

Comparative statistics of schools in Korea for Koreans and Japanese (with statistics of mission schools).

GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS FOR KOREANS.

Kind of school.	Number.	Scholars.	Applications.
Elementary public school	447	67,629	.....
High elementary school	3	537	2,651

CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS.

Kind of school.	Number.	Scholars.
Elementary school	601	22,542

Government schools for Japanese:
Government subsidies	Y. 339,660
Population	300,000
Christian schools:
Government subsidies	None.
Population	300,000

The above table shows that for a Korean population of 17,500,000 the Government has provided no more than 447 schools, capable of receiving no more than 67,629 scholars, or about one three-hundredths of the population. Compared with this there has been provided for the 300,000 Japanese residents 324 schools, capable of receiving 34,100 scholars, or one-ninth of the population. This does not mean that the Koreans are unwilling to educate their boys. The governor general reports the existence of no fewer than 21,800 old-type village schools, which must provide the elements of education to some 500,000 boys. To this must be added the 22,542 children attending Christian schools. But it is the higher-grade school system that receives most criticism from the Korean. Not only do the Japanese boys and girls in Korea get a higher standard of education than the native Korean, but more ample provision is made for their numbers. Including the three colleges, there are only seven schools for Koreans above the common public-school grade, capable of admitting no more than 978 scholars, whereas the Japanese children have 14 schools, with a capacity for receiving 992 scholars. Surely this leaves the administration open to the charge of discrimination and to the further charge of refusing the Korean the benefits of higher education. Here again the excuse can not be made that Koreans are indifferent to higher education, for in 1916 there were 3,682 applicants for the 978 places. The much suspected and maligned Christian church has stepped into the breach and, with its 31 academies and 4 colleges, receives yearly almost 4,000 students. If it be argued that the Government encourages young Koreans to take their higher education in Japan, the answer is that for most young men the cost is prohibitive, and that what applies to the Korean youth should apply equally to the sons of Japanese settlers. Not until the Government makes a fair provision from public funds for the native Koreans as she does for the Japanese colonists will she free herself from the stigma of "race discrimination" within her own empire.

Another example of this "race discrimination" is to be found in her system of official appointments. This is the natural outgrowth of her military policy, and depends upon the educational system for an excuse for its continuance. The ignorance and incapacity of the Korean officials of the former régime was made the excuse for the wholesale employment of Japanese in the higher official service. It was fondly hoped by Koreans that as the years went by and their stronger men acquired more experience and were educated under the Japanese administration the higher official positions would be thrown open to them. The opposite has been the policy and practice of the Japanese. In 1910, 6 out of 13 provincial governors were Korean, now there are only three. At that time all district magistracies were held by Koreans, now at least one-seventh of the largest districts are governed by Japanese magistrates, and even in some places the village provostship has been transferred to Japanese hands. The number of judgeships that have gone to the Koreans is very small, and all school principals are Japanese. The story is the same in every public department. But it is not only in the filling of offices that the discrimination appears but also in the dignity and remuneration attaching thereto. The Japanese officials of the same rank receive 40 per cent higher salaries than the Koreans, and in addition allowances for colonial service. This may happen in the case of men who graduate from the same school. One need not labor to point that the Japanese regard themselves as the superior race. It appears no less among the educated than among the lower classes. The most dignified Korean official, if met by a Japanese stranger, would invariably be conscious of the other's sense of superiority, and in the same business office the overbearing manner of the Japanese to their Korean assistants is evident enough even to the passer-by.

Look at the administration from whatever point you will, the aim of the Japanese to make Korea a preserve for Japanese officialdom and exploit her for the benefit of Japan and Japanese colonists stands out as clear as day. Visit the large harbors and you will find that the land adjoining the docks is monopolized by the Japanese, and the Koreans denied building rights within the Japanese section. The Crown lands that have been held in perpetual lease by generations of Korean farmers have been sold by the Government, almost exclusively to Japanese settlers. For this reason the immigration to Manchuria has been increasing year by year. The banking system of the peninsula has been greatly extended and improved and is increasingly proving a boon to the natives. But it is surely unfortunate that, with the possible exception of the Kanjo Bank, all the managers and nine-tenths of the clerks are Japanese. It is this wholesale handicapping of the Korean youth that engenders the disaffection which has recently shown itself. This coming as it does from a people who are so strongly urging their policy of "no race discrimination" is, to say the least, an aspersion on Japanese sincerity. Discrimination runs through their whole imperial policy, is applied in their private business enterprises, and is perpetuated by their school system. For not only are Japanese and Korean children separated in their schools, but the standard of education is higher for the Japanese than it is for the Korean.

The origin of the present demonstration in favor of independence has to be sought, then, in the persevering spirit, in the Korean's sense of humiliation, and in a due appreciation of the evils and deficiencies of the present administration. It has an immediate cause which will be noted below, but the movement is by no means "a sporadic revival of patriotism, based upon false reports and instigated by a few individuals." There are three classes principally involved, but a fourth followed spontaneously and swept all Korea into the movement.

(A) The Japanese lay the chief blame upon a sect called "The Church of the Heavenly Way." Their creed is a simple one of two lines, which, however, may not be as colorless as it looks:

Who waits on God shall wield God's might;
Who ne'er forgets all things come right.

Forgets what? To the initiated this may hold more than a religious meaning. Be that as it may, it is worth nothing that this sect has been in existence, under this name, since annexation. Its membership exceeds a million. On three gala days enormous crowds gather in the capital and throughout the country, ostensibly to worship, but in reality to perpetuate the spirit of patriotism and incidentally to provide the organization for a united effort when "the day" should arrive. The sect is avowedly politico-religious, and their prominence in the recent demonstrations is easily accounted for.

(B) The same can not be said of the native Christian church. For many years the Korean Christians have been without hope in this world. So lacking has been their interest in political affairs that the chief tenet of their faith has been the second coming of Christ. The Japanese themselves have been severe in their criticism of the "other worldliness" of the Christian community. It was a surprise, therefore, to the officials and to the missionaries no less, when the church threw off its cloak of indifference and unanimously began to tackle the political problem of the country. The Japanese interpretation of this phenomena is a comment upon the official mind. They refuse to think that the Korean people could have conceived or carried through such a movement without the aid of foreign missionaries. They have despised the ability of the Korean, and have made it their policy to crush all initiative. Hence, too, their mad rage against the Christians. Profession of faith is a heinous crime and a proof that the believer is in league with the foreigner against Japan. The Korean is denied the credit of being able to think or act independently. The prominent part played by the Christians in the revolt is only a proof that the more enlightened and more sensitive natures are to be found in the church. And who but a prig would deny that political wisdom might be expected even from a Christian?

(C) The third class involved consists of Koreans abroad. Students and business men in Japan, China, Russia, and America can not fail to be influenced by the present world movements. The problems of the peace conference are their problems. Most of them have left Korea as a protest against Japanese rule, and it is inevitable that correspondence with friends in Korea should have nourished the patient but persistent anticipations of "the day."

(D) The educated Koreans are to be found in one or the other of the above classes, or in the Buddhist faith. Little mention has been made of the part played by the Buddhists in the rising, but two of their leading priests signed the declaration of independence and demonstrations took place in many of their monasteries. But it was not from the educated classes alone that the protest came. Despite the censorship of the Japanese press, which left many places completely isolated, the country people spontaneously rose throughout the whole land. This can only be explained by the assumption that it needed only a rumor to rouse the national spirit from its seeming lethargy. Old men and ignorant peasants joined in the demonstration. Forbidden oracles and prophecies were brought from the recesses of the past and discussed. "Wai Wang Sam Nyunm Ka Jung Pal Nyun," a 500-year-old prophecy, is now interpreted as meaning "a Japanese king for three years" (referring to the protectorate 1907–1910), "Eight years' rule by 'Ka'" (Kain being the name of the present reigning Emperor, and this the eighth year of his reign). Such like oracles are the common possession of the peasant class and the Bible of the old men. Omens and portents are eagerly sought. During these days the hills around ——— resounded to shouts of "Mansai" by an unseen host. Strange maneuvers of Japanese and of old Korean flags have been reported and taken as good omens. We may laugh at the superstition, but we are forced to note the fact that a nation-wide revolution could be evoked on such slim evidence. The merest semblance of an opportunity was eagerly grasped which might bring relief from their oppressive rule.

The immediate reason for the revolt is the idea that Korea may share in the application of the principle of national self-determination. Koreans feel that at last the world is going to be offered another opportunity to revive just national ideas. Times have changed since Japan took over Korea. They feel that it is no longer either justifiable or possible to maintain the peace of the East by a form of government that crushes every legitimate aspiration of a people of 20,000,000 souls. It was in the hope that the world might learn the true state of affairs in Korea, in the hope that even the statesmen gathered in Paris might learn it, that the present movement was launched.

The revolution was organized by a committee of 33 leaders, who issued a manifesto calling upon Koreans everywhere to unite, stating their aims, and counseling peaceful methods. The three main clauses read as follows:

(1) What we as a nation desire is justice, human rights, a fair chance to life, and scope for legitimate ideals.

(2) We pledge ourselves to the last man and the last hour to see that a fair statement of our people's mind is given to the world.

(3) Let us look to conduct that we do all things orderly, molesting no one, and respecting property.

In pursuance of this policy the Korean demonstrators have instituted a passive revolution. With empty hands, save for the carrying of a small Korean flag, with nothing but shouts of "Mansei—long live Korea!"—the movement has been remarkable for its freedom from violence on the part of the Koreans. They possess no arms and would have been at the mercy of the Japanese military had they resorted to force. The marvel is that they were able to endure to the end and refuse to retaliate against the brutal methods which the administration has taken to subdue the disturbances. The Japanese soldiery were let loose in many places and played havoc among the most innocent. Churches have been wrecked and men hurried to jail on the merest pretext. The usual brutal methods of police investigation have been adopted, and men have come out of the police stations so bruised and battered as to be unfit for work for days. A strike or two in the capital, the refusal of the storekeepers to open their doors, the closing of schools, and frequent demonstrations in favor of independence—that has been the extent of the revolt. Thousands are in jail, and thousands more are carrying on the work which their organizers began. There seems to be no disposition to give up until some promise of reform is given. The Japanese have, unfortunately, made up their minds to suppress the revolt by force and intimidation. It remains to be seen who will win out.

The question of the fitness of the Korean people to govern themselves has been much to the fore. Fears have been expressed that if Japan left Korea alone to-day, the result would be anarchy and Bolshevism. That there would be factions no one will deny—is there any country in this old world where there are not? But that Koreans would go to extremes no one who knows their peace-loving character will grant. It is manifestly unfair to saddle upon new Korea the faults of a former autocratic régime. Times have changed. Koreans of good standing and ability have received their education in Japan and America. They have received American ideals through American missionaries. The Japanese system has not tended to produce big men, but despite it capable men are to be found. The government of a church differs greatly from the administration of a country, but the fundamental faculty is the same. If the ability shown by the Korean Christians in their church courts is any criterion, one might even hope for their successful administration of national affairs. The very efficiency and courage which they have shown in their present revolt is no mean proof of their ability, and the unanimity with which all classes throughout the entire land followed the lead of their committees show a remarkable power of organization and a wonderful willingness to be led. The Koreans are divided in their political aims. Some desire a form of self-government under the suzerainty of Japan along the lines of Britain's self-governing dominions. Others maintain that as Korea and Japan are two distinct races with different national spirit, absolute autonomy alone will provide the necessary opportunity for national progress. Koreans feel confident that they could make as good a showing as Japan. Korean students in Japan, of whom there are 800 this year, claim that they more than hold their own with Japanese students, despite the handicap of the Japanese language. Be that as it may, one thing stands clear—things can never go along as they did before the revolt. Whatever may result the Koreans must be given a greater opportunity to develop along their own national lines. Their national history must be held inviolate, their national language respected. Military rule with its system of gendarmerie must go, and the common rights of man be secured for all. The educational system must give the Korean youth the best possible chance to make good, and the offer of promotion to higher offices must prove the incentive. Ultimately there should be no office in the State which a Korean boy may not one day aspire to. Whether this will mean that Japan must withdraw from the peninsula or not one can not predict. It remains to be seen whether Japan, in the present instance, will respond to the reasonable and restrained protest of this people in the spirit of the times. There are not wanting signs that Japan is mustering courage to defy the enemy within her own gates. The world, and little Korea, will await the outcome. In the meantime we content ourselves with knowing that imperial military rule in Korea stands condemned, and that instead of the two nations being perfectly united they are further apart to-day than ever.

COPIES OF DOCUMENTS PRESENTED TO IMPORTANT JAPANESE IN TOKYO BY A COMMITTEE FROM KOREA—SOME REASONS UNDERLYING THE PRESENT AGITATION IN CHOSEN.

MAY 10, 1919.

The following paper is a condensed statement of what appear to be the most important of the underlying causes of the present agitation in Korea. All of the reasons given have appeared in some form or other in declarations, petitions, and bulletins issued by the Koreans, and so may be taken as an expression of Korean opinion. The statement contains only what seem to some friends of Japan and Korea to be the most important of the causes involved.

It should be said also that it does not embody the immediate causes of this outbreak such as the rumors in connection with the work of the peace conference, prevalent ideas of "self-determination," the activities of Koreans abroad, and the death of the ex-Emperor of Korea.

I.—The desire for independence.

It must be remembered that the assimilation of an alien race is a difficult task at best and that in this case it is made more difficult by the fact that the Koreans as a people have never in their hearts been reconciled to annexation.

II.—The rigor of the military administration.

Koreans do not know what it would be like to be under a civil administration. Their whole idea of the Imperial Government is drawn from their experience of military rule.

1. The fact that the police have gendarmes and soldiers associated with them in the administration of law leads the Korean to fear the police and to regard them not as civil servants and protectors but as oppressors.

2. This impression is deepened by the harsh and indiscriminate manner in which laws are administered. In the report issued by the government general in July, 1918 (covering the year 1916–17), it is stated that out of 82,121 offenders dealt with in "police summary judgment," 952 were pardoned, 81,139 were sentenced, and only 30 were able to prove their innocence. The unavoidable result of such a system is that a naturally peaceful and gentle-minded people are living in a state of constant terror.

3. The spy system has added to the terrorization of the people. Spies, usually low-class Koreans, are everywhere. No one knows when nor in what form the most harmless acts or words may be reported to the authorities.

4. The treatment of those arrested adds to the fear and hatred of the police.

5. The show of force on all occasions adds to the irritation. Civil officials, even primary school-teachers, wear swords.

6. This system has brought the people to believe that the administration has no idea of leading them, but only of compelling obedience.

III.—Denationalization.

1. The Koreans are a different race, with different history, traditions, ideals, ethics, and customs. The present administration seems to aim at the elimination of many things traditionally Korean and the substitution of things new and strange. There seems to be no systematic attempt to win the Korean's loyalty for Japan but to make over the Korean into a Japanese.

2. The exclusion of the Korean language from schools, courts, and legal documents is a great source of irritation. It is recognized that the question of language presents a problem to the Government, but the effect of the present policy on the mind of the Korean can not be minimized.

3. The elimination of Korean history from school curricula is another source of irritation. The Koreans feel that the presentation of the subject of Korean history is neither as full nor as accurate as its importance would warrant.

IV.—The Koreans have no real share in their government, either legislative or executive, and no hope of securing this has been held out to them.

1. Some Koreans do hold office, but usually minor ones, and in the case of those holding an important office they can usually be overruled by Japanese officials of lower rank.

2. The inferior education given to the Korean students deprives them of the hope of securing positions by competitive merit in the future.

V.—Discrimination against Koreans.

1. There is discrimination in salaries for the same services in government institutions, in business houses, and in labor.

2. In government schools the curriculum is different for Japanese and Koreans. The latter have from two to three years shorter course than the former. In the matter of English also, which all desire to learn, the Japanese have four days a week for five years while the Koreans have only two hours a week for two years. Such differences in educational facilities may be accounted for by the government's inability to provide full courses as yet, but it works an evident hardship and is resented by the Koreans.

3. Corporal punishment can be legally administered only to Koreans.

4. There is discrimination in many apparently minor but really significant matters. For instance, Koreans are rarely employed as train boys or akabos, and Japanese rickisha men are given the best positions at railway stations.

VI.—No liberty of speech, press, or assembly.

(Christian Koreans were arrested who were heard praying for a spiritual revival, the authorities insisting that this meant a political revival.)

1. Religion can not be taught in private schools according to the government revised educational ordinances, which recognize no difference between government and private schools.

2. In the case of Christianity, the Bible can not be taught in private schools opened since March, 1915, or in any schools after 1925.

3. Ceremonies are required which seem to be a violation of conscience to Koreans.

4. Local officials constantly intimidate Christians and those intending to become Christians, in what appears to be an effort to discourage Christianity.

VIII.—Practical prohibition of Korean study and travel abroad.

1. Koreans know that Japan's progress is largely traceable to foreign studies at the beginning of the Meiji Era and since, and desire the same opportunity for improvement. With the exception of certain specially favored cases, Koreans are not permitted to go abroad, and those who have received their education abroad are not permitted to return.

2. Even Koreans who have been educated in Japan are so constantly watched by the police on their return to Korea that they can make no proper use of their education.

IX.—Expropriation of crown lands.

In many sections of Korea crown lands have been occupied and farmed by the Koreans for generations on the basis of a moderate rental. In many cases the leasehold of these lands had acquired a value almost equal to that of land held in full possession. These lands, however, were in many cases turned over to the Oriental Development Co., and the former occupants required to pay greatly increased rents, which compelled them to abandon the land in favor of government-assisted Japanese settlers.

X.—Demoralizing influences newly introduced.

1. Licensed prostitution in all cities and towns has made this form of immorality more open and accessible, and hence has had a more demoralizing effect as well as a more widespread influence upon the young men of the country.

2. The persistent sale of the morphine needle has been unrestricted in many sections.

XI.—Forced migration to Manchuria.

The extensive migration of Japanese farmers into central and southern Korea and their occupation of often unjustly secured lands has forced the migration of thousands of Koreans into the less desirable and undeveloped sections of Manchuria.

XII.—Many improvements benefit Japanese more than Koreans.

1. Industrial, e. g.: The lumber industry, although extensively developed, brings no additional benefit to the Koreans. In fact, lumber costs more than formerly.

2. Commercial: The Korean merchants lack modern business training and experience, which makes it difficult for them to withstand the unrestricted competition of Japanese merchants.

3. In many cases licensed monopolies work great hardship to the Koreans and cause resentment, e. g., the cotton monopoly and the fertilizer monopoly in Sen Sen.

BRUTALITIES IN SYENCHUN IN MAY.

(Statement by Rev. ———.)

MAY 25, 1919.

Eleven Kangkei boys came here from ———. All the 11 were beaten 90 stripes—30 each day for three days, May 16, 17, and 18, and let out May 18. Nine came here May 22, and two more May 24.

Tak Chank Kuk died about noon, May 23.

Kim Myungha died this evening.

Kim Hyungsun is very sick.

Kim Chungsun and Song Taksam are able to walk, but are badly broken.

Kim Oosik seemed very doubtful, but afterwards improved.

Choi Tungwon, Kim Changook, Kim Sungkil, and Ko Pongsu are able to be about, though the two have broken flesh.

Kim Syungha rode from ——— on his bicycle and reached here about an hour before his brother died. The first six who came into the hospital were in a dreadful fix, four days after the beating. No dressing or anything had been done for them. Dr. Sharrocks just told me that he feels doubtful about some of the others since Myungha died. It is gangrene. One of these boys is a Chun Kyoin, and another is not a Christian, but the rest are all Christians.

Mr. Lampe has photographs. The stripes were laid on to the buttocks and the flesh pounded into a pulp.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask leave to have included in the RECORD an editorial from the National Inquirer, of Indianapolis, Ind., of July 10, 1919. The editorial deals with article 10 of the league of nations covenant and describes the character, need, and effect of the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ARTICLE 10.

"Article 10 of the league of nations covenant, sought to be eliminated through reservations to be made by the Senate in the resolution of ratification, is of the essence of the covenant—its foundation, without which the covenant would be as a house built in the air.

"Its elimination would be, in effect, rejection of the covenant, for it would constitute a fundamental and vital change, such as would lead other nations, now signatory to it, to refuse to accept the covenant so mutilated.

"There is no doubt of the power of the Senate to make the reservation. It has the constitutional right to do its will with the treaty—covenant and all. It can reject it in toto, it can rewrite it, it can strike out clauses and sections, and add others, and make such interpretations as to the provisions of any clause, section, or article as it may desire. All of that is admitted.

"But if the Senate changes the terms and conditions of the treaty by elimination, addition, or interpretation, or by qualification of its acceptance through reservation as to any article, section, or clause, which, in the judgment of other nations signatory thereto, affects the meaning, purpose, or terms in manner or degree unsatisfactory to them, thereby making the treaty, in purpose, meaning, or terms different from that which they signed, such nations can file their refusal to accept the treaty as changed, modified, or interpreted, and refuse to be bound thereby, and the treaty at that instant would, as to any and all of such protesting nations, become null and void, and be thereafter, as to them, as though the United States had rejected the treaty, or as if it had never been.

"If article 10 is, as we believe it to be, the foundation stone of the covenant, it is essential to its vitality and its life, and its elimination would be such a change as to justify and all but inevitably lead to rejection by the other signatory nations.

"Upon our ratification of the treaty, emasculated by the elimination of this section, the other signatory nations, and especially Great Britain, France, and Italy, and perhaps Japan, would promptly file protests and renunciations, as they would have a right to do, and then as to us, there would be not only no league of nations covenant and no league of nations but no treaty at all.

"In that event the protesting nations could continue the treaty among themselves with the United States excluded, and form a league of nations without us; or they could summons the members of the peace council into session and conference again and begin an effort to formulate a new treaty by new negotiations in the hope that, after months of labor, something mutually acceptable and which could subsequently be ratified could be obtained.

"Neither of these alternatives, it seems to us, is to be seriously thought of, much less desired. To create the necessity or likelihood of either, under the perilous conditions now existent throughout the world, and especially in Europe, would be to incur a responsibility which we as a Nation ought not to assume.

"Having joined in the overthrow of old conditions, we are in duty bound to remain in at the settlement and share with our associates the responsibility of rehabilitation.

"It will not be a sufficient answer for our withdrawal from such responsibility to say: 'We prefer the isolation and aloofness we enjoyed before the cataclysm engulfed us and involved us in the fateful struggle.' The matter of the abandonment of our isolation was a thing to have been thought of and determined before we abandoned it by becoming a participant in the war or sending our armies to Europe, or even declaring war.

"There were conditions which we believed compelled the abandonment of our traditions and our isolation and coerced us into entrance into the war. Confronted with these conditions, we abandoned traditions and isolation and entered the war. The momentous decision, which the opponents of the league covenant seem now so much to dread, was made then, and made irretrievably, and is not now to be made. It is stare decisis—a thing done; an accomplished fact.

"Through that decision and the things we did in making it effective we changed the conditions of peoples and the status of nations. Governments were overthrown, old institutions dissolved, new governments created, and new institutions put in process of establishment. By that decision then made and our subsequent acts, joined with the acts of the Allies, we changed the weights and balances of the whole world, and can not now recede from the consequences and leave them unredressed, without giving all the world lasting cause for grievance and just ground for censure. We can not now recede from the decision then made. After the decision and our acts under it, we can not change our mind without injury and offense not only to other peoples but to ourselves.

"This grave and indisputable fact leads us, therefore, as a matter of good faith to others and to ourselves, to examine with open minds the character, the need, and the effect of the article in the covenant we propose to eliminate, that we may be sure the gravity and peril of its acceptance are such as to justify striking it out of the covenant, and our breach of faith as to the decision we made when we entered the war, and as to the acts we did in giving our decision effect, and as to the changed conditions which have come upon the world in consequence of our acts. This much, we think, is of necessity demanded of us. We must be sure of justification before recession from that decision and the betrayal of the responsibility consequent upon our acts thereunder. And we can not find justification in invective or vituperation or in charging the article in question to be what it plainly and clearly is not, nor in strained constructions or forced and unwarranted interpretations.

"Justification for so grave an act of recession and so profound a breach of good faith on the part of a nation sensitive of its honor and alive to its duties in the world of nations, and its obligations to mankind, can not be found in passion, in personal animosity, in party desire for advantage, or in the selfish ambition of men. It must be found, if at all, in fact and in fair intendment—found within the actual letter of the article or in the indubitable spirit of it.

"From this conclusion, it seems to us, there is no escape.

"This brings us, therefore, to the inquiry: What is the character and the need of article 10 of the league covenant, and if accepted by us what would be its effect upon us as a Nation and upon our institutions?

"These questions we mean to consider elsewhere in these columns.

"HANLY."

CHARACTER OF ARTICLE 10.

"What is article 10? For what does it provide? What are its terms? Are they such as to warrant the things said of them by some of the Members of the Senate of the United States?

"Such things as these:

"'A monstrosity; obliterative of legitimate race and national aspirations; oppressive of weak nations and peoples; destructive of human progress and liberty; hideous monstrosity; makes us the guarantors forever of the territories of 32 separate governments specifically named in the covenant and of at least 13 other governments to be added thereafter; under the covenant we would underwrite forever the status quo of the whole world; this league means that American boys shall police the world; that all the tottering nations of the earth shall be upheld by our blood and bone; that we, with our glorious past, shall guarantee the territorial integrity of every country on earth and the bondage of every suffering people in anguish begging for freedom; it means the halting and betrayal of New World liberalism, the triumph of cynical Old World diplomacy; the humiliation and end of American idealism.'

"The best answer to these charges, it seems to us, can be found in the text of the article itself. We have quoted it before in other editorials appearing in these columns, but we submit it again:

"'The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.'

"We pass over the suggestion which involuntarily occurs to every candid, open mind, that the language in which the opponents of the league have characterized this section, and which we have quoted above, and which might be extended over an entire page of this paper without exhausting the epithets that have been hurled against it and the vituperation laid upon it, is the language of men who are about to betray a great and solemn trust and who seek justification for their perfidy by vituperation and denunciation in advance of their acts, and go directly to the question of the provisions and meaning of the article itself.

"Article 10, it must be remembered, does not stand alone. It is:

"'The preliminary assertion of solidarity upon which articles 11 to 17 are based, and each in a way encompasses them. It establishes a principle; they define its application. It is a mistake to consider article 10 as something that stands alone. Nor is it less a part of the two articles which precede it, those relating to disarmament. In itself it calls for no action by the league or the members of the league unless some extraordinary emergency arises for which no other provision is made in the covenant. In that remote exigency the council is directed to advise upon the means by which the obligations under it may be fulfilled. The council can only advise. It rests upon the respective Governments themselves to decide how they will fulfill their obligations under it. The advice of the council must be by unanimous agreement of its members, and the United States will be a member. No advice as to the course of action will, therefore, be given that would be considered unjust to the United States by the representative of our Government. Probably no advice will be given by the council until after consultation with the respective Governments represented in the council. This consultation would seem to be essential in important matters, for this is a league of nations, not a superstate, and the members of the council are primarily but representatives of the nations that are given the predominating influence. Inasmuch as these nations have the greatest power, both in themselves and in the league, their responsibilities will be the greater, and they will endeavor to reach an agreement among themselves as to what action should be taken in case of such an extraordinary emergency as would fall upon article 10 alone. Each Government must be its own judge as to the manner in which it will fulfill its obligation, and the character and extent of its support will depend upon the circumstances of the case, the greatness of the emergency, and the degree of its own danger. That danger would be measured to a large extent by proximity, and it is reasonable to assume that the countries nearest the seat of trouble would be first to go to the aid of the one attacked. But somehow all would help, if the help of all were seen to be necessary, and it is this assurance that is required to give cohesion and stability to the association, and which alone can provide the moral influence, which may become compulsory, that must be provided for in the absence of a permanent international police force.

"'To summarize, article 10 is the necessary binding of the nations into a unified and potential force for mutual respect and protection. The fulfillment of all ordinary obligations in the pledge it involves is provided for in other articles. It is only in exceptional circumstances not otherwise provided for that action under it specifically would be appealed for. The occurrence of such circumstances is highly improbable, but if they should develop each nation would be the judge of its obligations under the article. Good faith would require the support it pledges, but whether that support would be economic alone or both economic and military would depend upon the nature of the case and the understanding reached by the respective Governments.'

"As suggested in the editorial immediately preceding, article 10 is the basic section of the league, the preliminary assurance of mutual support against external aggression threatening territorial integrity or loss of sovereignty. It is an agreement and a pledge, an agreement that the members of the league will not only themselves respect the sovereignty and the territorial rights of one another but a pledge that they will protect them from aggression by others.

"There is no effort made by this section or elsewhere in the covenant to commit the league to the maintenance of the status quo as to the territorial limits of its members against domestic insurrection or internal revolution—not a word, a syllable, or a letter providing for it or requiring it by any just intendment or justifying such an interpretation. It is a straw man, manufactured by the league's enemies. The agreement by the members to respect the territorial rights of one another of necessity relates to external aggression, and the pledge to preserve the territorial integrity of the respective members by express language is limited to 'external aggression' and 'political independence.' As has well been said, this qualification alone answers most of the arguments directed against the article.

"Former President Taft makes conclusive refutation of the contention that article 10 is not a covenant against revolution by 'oppressed peoples struggling for freedom' in one of his letters in behalf of the covenant:

"'It is objected to article 10 that it is too rigid; that progress of the world may need rearrangement of boundaries, an enlargement of one country and a reduction of another, or the creation of new States. Article 10 does not forbid changes in boundaries or the enlargement or reduction of States or the establishment of new States. All that it forbids is the taking of territory by force from a member of the league or overthrowing its Government by violence. Article 10 does not protect any nation against internal disturbance, rebellion, or revolution. It does not prevent the division of States by these means. The objection assumes that war by one existing nation upon another is necessary to the progress of the world to secure useful changes in boundary. We need not deny that a war of aggression may achieve a useful end; but the basis upon which the league rests is that such advantages are outweighed by the suffering in modern war and the possibility that a small war may lead to a general war and an enormous damage to civilization. The effort in the formulation of the present treaty is to make just boundaries, and the effect of article 10 will, doubtless, be to maintain those boundaries, in so far as to prevent foreign aggression from affecting them.'

"The opponents of the league seize upon article 10 and declare it to be what it is not and to intend what it does not intend and give, as we have seen, forced and unwarranted interpretations to its language that they may have a basis for the denunciation and epithets and vituperation they hurl against it.

"It is incredible that the President and an ex-President of the United States, members of different political parties, holding diametrically opposed views in regard to the domestic questions which divide their parties, and having nothing in common except their Americanism and their love of country, should both be asking the people of the United States to accept an instrument 'destructive of human progress and liberty,' requiring us to 'guarantee the bondage of every suffering people in anguish begging for freedom,' and binding us to the betrayel of 'New World liberalism.'

"This suggestion is so unworthy as to be undebatable.

"HANLY."

THE NEED OF ARTICLE 10.

"Armies and armaments have cursed the world for centuries, wrecked its cities, devastated its fields, killed its people, and drenched its soil with blood.

"They are not guarantors of peace, but instruments of war. The verity of this statement is beyond dispute. The history of all times, all lands, and all peoples confirms it. If there was ever doubt concerning it, the Great War just closed and the causes which produced and led to it would of themselves establish it.

"Knowing this, and with the red horror of the last five years fresh in their memories, and the wreck and ruin it inflicted spread before their eyes, the representatives of the nations convening at Paris to formulate a treaty, calculated to conserve the fruits of the victory won by the allied and associated nations, sought to provide for the dismantling of armaments and the demobilization of arms, and to prohibit their subsequent creation, beyond police necessity.

"With that purpose the peoples of the earth are in accord.

"But when they attempted to provide for the disarmament of nations, they were confronted with the fact that there would be some nations who would not willingly join in disarmament, but would insist upon building navies and forts and arsenals and mustering and maintaining great standing armies. Europe had just been all but crushed by such a nation and would have been utterly so but for our intervention. Twice in half a century France had been wounded all but unto death by such a nation. For more than a century her people lived in the dread of invasion, and in the presence of the peril that twice in a generation had fallen upon her.

"Under such conditions peaceable nations feared to disarm lest they be left to the mercy of armed aggressors.

"To meet that fear, born of dread experience and kept alive by the present menace, it has been proposed that the nations who disarm shall form themselves into a league which shall not only respect the sovereignty and national independence and the territories of one another, but which shall bind all of them in a pledge of common defense against external aggression threatening the independence or the territories of any of them.

"Here is the need of article 10 of the league covenant and the reason why it is formulated and why it should be accepted and confirmed.

"To strike down article 10 would be to destroy the foundation of the league and to make futile all effort toward disarmament.

"The manner in which the member nations are to be protected in their independence and their territories against external aggression is not provided for in this section, but it is in other sections, and it is so carefully guarded that no nation can justly hesitate to accept the covenant because of it.

"Article 10 is:

"'First of all, the fundamental agreement of mutual support in case of attack from without. It is the foundation upon which the other articles relating to international disputes is laid. There would be no league without it, for many of the nations concerned would not enter into an association that called for disarmament unless some such pledge were made, just as a man whose life is threatened is unwilling to give up his arms unless assured that he will be protected in other ways. If the plans of disarmament are carried out to the satisfaction of the countries and made universal, the time will come when such an agreement as this will be superfluous, for the fear which demands it now will be removed. But under present conditions, and the terror of Germany's sudden and prodigious attack still in the minds of the world, such an understanding is an essential basis for a peace that can be felt to be secure. This is particularly true because of the new countries that are being created as a result of the war and whose integrity and sovereignty are in special need of exterior support. The respect of sovereignty is another important feature. All nations are jealous of their sovereign rights as nations, particularly their right to conduct their own affairs, and this is a proper agreement to respect those rights.'

"The need here disclosed is too essential and imperative to be explained away by vituperation or denunciation. To strike out of the covenant this clause would be to rip out its heart and leave it a mangled, lifeless thing, which the other nations signatory to it will at once reject, preferring to arm themselves and stand in their own might rather than assent to disarmament with nothing to protect them or assure their defense against their neighbors who do not disarm.

"If this article falls through our rejection of it the league covenant falls, for it is as to the covenant an elemental thing, and if the covenant falls the treaty of peace falls, for it is the basis and the corner stone of the treaty.

"It is important that the American people understand the reason for the article, the essential place it holds in the league pact and in the treaty, and that they instruct their representatives in the Senate of the United States as to their will concerning it.

THE EFFECT OF ARTICLE 10.

"The effect of article 10 will not be, as contended by its enemies, to involve the United States in constant conflict and world-distant war, or 'that American boys shall police the world,' or that 'the tottering nations of the earth shall be upheld by our blood and bone.'

"Quite the contrary. It will mean that the conscience of the world, centralized and personified in a single world entity, having back of it the will, the purpose, and the ability, economic and military, of the member nations of that entity, will be far more potent and effectual in preventing attacks upon the sovereignty, independence, or territory of the member nations than all the navies that can be built or armies that can be mustered.

It will marshal the spiritual verities, the imponderables, which more than armaments or navies and armies control, in the last analysis, the affairs of men and put them in the scales against the aggressor who seeks to challenge the sovereignty or question the independence or invade the territory of the member nations.

"Its effect will be to create a greater deterrent of aggression than men have hitherto known.

"The result will not be, as its foes so wildly proclaim, the maintenance of the status quo of the internal affairs of its members against revolution waged by misgoverned, oppressed, or distraught peoples.

"On the contrary, it will create an entity the influence of which will ever and always powerfully plead for justice and fair dealing not only as between nations, but as between governments and their own peoples. It will create, foster, and diffuse among men a spirit of conciliation and of recognition of the great fundamental human rights upon which all just government is founded and make for the liberation of peoples and a wider freedom.

"Nor does it follow that in the event of war between distant peoples that the United States would be called upon by the league to send a single soldier to the scene of the conflict. The league would express its power if armed intervention became necessary through the military forces situated nearest to the seat of the trouble. Save in case of international strife here in the New World, or in that of one in the Old, of such proportions and vitalness as to imperil the world, there is scarcely a remote possibility that a single drop of American blood will be shed because of our undertaking to aid in the preservation of the 'territorial integrity' and existing 'political independence' of the members of the league against 'external aggression.'

"In answer to the claim that the effect will be to prevent the territorial development of nations or the emancipation of peoples struggling for freedom, let it be said:

"'The United States is living evidence that war is not essential to territorial expansion and development. We added Florida and Louisiana Purchase and Alaska to our domain by peaceable means. There is nothing in article 10 to prevent such territorial changes. Nor is there anything to prevent changes in form or character of any government. It proposes no interference with peoples in their internal affairs. If a part of a nation should desire to separate from the rest and set up an independent government, there is nothing in this article or elsewhere in the covenant calling for hostile action by the league or any of its members. The possibility that we, for example, might be prevented from going to the rescue of a people seeking their independence is not a persuasive objection. We have had many opportunities in the past, but only once in all history have we taken up arms in such a cause, and there is not the slightest probability of another case similar to Cuba arising in this hemisphere. All the people in the Western World are now free. Although we have had profound sympathy for the struggles for freedom occurring from time to time in the Eastern Hemisphere, we have never once even thought of going to war for them. As to the claim set up by one or two objectors that this would constitute an impious limitation of the Almighty, we are disposed to believe that no association of men can in any way limit His power.'

"The purpose of article 10 is to prevent, if possible, wars of aggression, and failing in that, to minimize the frequency of their recurrence and to localize them and terminate them quickly when they do recur, and will, we believe, if retained and the covenant is accepted, fulfill its purpose.

YES, "FALSE AND FRAUDULENT."

"In a recent editorial in Harvey's Weekly, article 21 of the league of nations covenant is denounced as 'both foolish and fraudulent,' a title far more applicable to the argument made against it than to the article itself.

"This article has been quoted before in these columns, but we submit it again, that the reader may have it before him.

"'Article 21. Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine for securing the maintenance of peace.'

"It is insisted in the editorial in question that the purpose of the article is not the exemption of the Monroe doctrine from the jurisdiction of the league of nations, but its commitment to that jurisdiction. It is said:

"'Had the Paris conference wished to except it from the league of nations jurisdiction, all it had to do was to say so. How easy it would have been to say so is impressively shown by striking out of article 21 the gross errors of definition by implication as follows: "Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of * * * the Monroe doctrine."

"'That would have been the straightforward, the honorable way to do it. The way not to do it was by adopting the evasive language, flatly false in its every inference and implication, which makes of article 21 as it stands nothing more nor less than a contemptuous insult to American intelligence. It is a fraud on its face, a fraud and, worse than that, a blunder, and a blunder all but Teutonic in its clumsy stupidity.'

"The words which, if omitted, leave article 21 as the author of the editorial insists it should have been are: 'International engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like * * *.'

"The answer is that, in so far as article 21 relates to the Monroe doctrine, that is precisely what has been done. The article is, and was intended to be, broader than the Monroe doctrine. It saves from the jurisdiction of the league 'international engagements such as treaties of arbitration,' as well as the Monroe doctrine. Everyone knows—including Mr. Harvey, the author of the editorial in question, that there are many existing treaties of arbitration between many of the nations that are to become signatories to the league covenant. These treaties are not to be abrogated and are not to be brought within the league's jurisdiction. Their validity is not to be affected by the league covenant. It is intended to, and does, exclude them as well as the Monroe doctrine, from the league's jurisdiction.

"It is insisted that the words 'regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine' are intended to, and do, leave the Monroe doctrine within the jurisdiction of the league and destroy its validity, notwithstanding the declaration that: 'Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of * * * the Monroe doctrine.' This contention is based upon the assumption that the Monroe doctrine 'is not regional' and 'is not an understanding,' and that being referred to as something which it is not, it is not excluded from the jurisdiction of the league.

"The reasoning is fallacious; even if it be granted that the Monroe doctrine is not 'a regional understanding' and that reference to it as such is a misnomer, it does not follow that the effort to exempt it from the jurisdiction of the league would fail because of the error in its classification, since it is specifically mentioned by name.

"It is also insisted that the Monroe doctrine 'is not for securing the maintenance of peace.' If it is not for that, then what, we ask, is it for? The truth is, it is exactly for that. It was announced by President Monroe and has been maintained from then till now, for the very reason that its application to the Western Hemisphere makes for the peace of this hemisphere. The very basis of its enunciation in the first instance was the belief that the subjugation of the South American republics and Old World colonization on American soil would bring monarchial institutions, inimical in their very nature to democratic institutions like ours, in such close proximity to us that they would multiply the danger of wars and lead to the disturbance of our own peace by conflicts of aggression waged by governments whose principles were irreconcilable with ours.

"That the announcement of the doctrine and its maintenance might possibly lead to a conflict, may be admitted without impairing in the slightest degree the soundness of the point we are seeking to make. That it might some time lead to conflict was, of course foreseen, but it was believed by the statesmen who conceived and proclaimed it, that such conflicts would be far less frequent and far less disastrous to us, than the conflicts which would be certain to follow from the proximity of monarchical institutions planted upon American soil and fostered to aggression by ambition.

"The doctrine was conceived and announced on this belief, and nearly a century of peace for the Western Hemisphere and of immunity from Old World aggression has resulted from its announcement and maintenance.

"It is true that it has stood throughout all this time as an American doctrine; that it has never been reduced to the terms of an international agreement and bears no signature of any government other than our own. But, having been announced and maintained by us now for nearly a century, and having been acquiesced in by the nations of the earth for all that period, it has become, we submit, 'a regional understanding,' so broad and so inclusive as to cover the region of the New World.

"By expressly reserving the Monroe doctrine from the jurisdiction of the league, the nations signatory to the league covenant make solemn record of their recognition and acceptance of it.

"And we having maintained it, to the New World's peace and benefit, and to the peace and benefit of the whole world—the Old and New—we ought to rejoice in the formal recognition and acceptance of it by the 14 nations who are entering with us the league of nations and signing its covenant.

"The editorial and not the covenant 'is a fraud on its face—a fraud, and, worse than that, a blunder, and a blunder all but Teutonic in its clumsy stupidity.'

"The caustic terms of Mr. Harvey fit exactly—fit his editorial, and not article 21 of the covenant.

"The history of American journalism affords no more mendacious assault upon a man or a great public document than that which is being made by Col. Harvey upon the President of the United States and the covenant of the league.

"His intolerance and bigotry are only exceeded by his personal hatred.

"HANLY."

JAPANESE CONTROL OF SHANTUNG.

Mr. COLT obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he will yield for me to ask for the consideration of a resolution which went over from the last session of the Senate under the objection of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]?

Mr. COLT. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the consideration of the resolution, if there is going to be no debate upon it. If there is, of course, I will defer it until the Senator from Rhode Island gets through.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 116, relative to the action of members of the American Peace Commission regarding Shantung, and also as to attempts by Japan or her peace delegates to control the Chinese peace delegation by intimidation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the words "American Peace Commission," insert "or of any officials attached thereto," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate a copy of any letter or written protest by any member or members of the American Peace Commission or of any officials attached thereto against the disposition or adjustment which was made with reference to Shantung, and particularly a copy of a letter written by Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, member of the Peace Commission, on behalf of himself, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, and Hon. Henry White, members of the Peace Commission, protesting against the provisions of the treaty with reference to Shantung.

Any memoranda or other information in the possession of the American Peace Commission or any member thereof with reference to the attempt of Japan or her peace delegates to intimidate the Chinese peace delegates, and to control the action of said Chinese delegates through and by means of intimidation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, as the peace treaty has now been submitted to the Senate, I wish briefly to discuss one aspect of it upon which public attention is mainly directed at this time.

The league of nations in its essence is simply an association of free nations. Its object is to prevent war through international cooperation. Broadly speaking, it covers three basic principles—obligatory conferences when war is threatened, compulsory submission of every international dispute to some form of arbitration or investigation and report before resorting to war, and reduction of armaments.

The principle of international cooperation as the means by which international peace can be made secure has never been tried before. All other means of preventing war have failed. International law, Hague peace conferences, alliances, arbitration treaties, the balance of power in Europe, and the Monroe doctrine in America have proved entirely inadequate to prevent the most terrible war in the history of mankind. Seven millions lie dead upon the fields of Europe and twenty millions are disabled through wounds or disease. Another such war would destroy civilization. And the danger of another such war is apparent when we consider that civilized nations are so united in every way except politically that a war anywhere is likely to spread into another world conflagration. The age of neutrality is passed forever.

There is no other conceivable solution of this great problem of preventing war except along the lines of a closer union of the family of nations based upon the principle of cooperation or federation. Not to try this experiment would leave the world in the same condition of international anarchy as it was before the war—a world divided into jealous and competing national units, fully armed and dominated by the spirit of an aggressive nationalism. It is this form of nationalism which leads to war, and the only way to overcome this obstacle to peace and to install the reign of law among nations is through international cooperation. This does not mean the surrender of true nationalism. There is no antagonism between true nationalism and an internationalism which would substitute the reign of law for the reign of force.

The league of nations presents itself in a double aspect. First, the league is absolutely necessary to secure the present peace of the world by the enforcement of the terms of peace, and, second, having accomplished this momentous task, it is also necessary to maintain the future peace of the world. For the present, however, we must address ourselves to the immediate problem of meeting world conditions created by the war and whether in order to accomplish this purpose America must not become a member of the league.

The question whether America should become a member of the league in order to meet present world conditions turns primarily upon the question whether we shall become jointly responsible for the enforcement of the terms of peace or whether we shall follow our traditional policy of nonintervention in the affairs of Europe and notify the Allies, as we did the European nations upon signing the treaty of Algeciras in 1906, that we can assume no obligation or responsibility for the enforcement of the terms of peace. If, however, we believe that it would be dishonorable to withdraw from Europe at this time, to desert France, England, and Italy in this critical hour when the whole world is in a turmoil, then the United States should certainly remain in the league during this world settlement and until peace and order are restored. And if it should be found that this association of free nations is not accompanied by all the terrible consequences which its enemies predict, and that it really is a preventive of war, we could then decide to continue our membership in the league. To my mind we must at least see through to the end the great undertaking upon which we embarked in entering the war, and as a part of this undertaking we must help to reestablish a new world order by the enforcement of the terms of peace, which can only be done by our becoming a member of the league of nations.

Mr. President, in the consideration of the league of nations much depends upon the attitude of mind with which the subject is approached. There are those who approach the subject with a strong feeling of dissent at the method the President has pursued at the Paris conference with respect to the whole peace treaty. Whatever may be the right of the President under the Constitution to negotiate ordinary treaties, they believe that he should have remained at home and should have consulted the Senate, and also should have ascertained the public sentiment of the country before negotiating a treaty which, to their minds, is subversive of our traditional policy and which binds America to a new world order. However just this criticism may be, and however much it may tend to prejudice the minds of many, it really has no bearing on the question of the merits of the league as part of the treaty or its ratification by the Senate.

There are others who approach the consideration of the league from the standpoint of our traditional policy of nonintervention by America in the affairs of Europe and nonintervention by Europe in the affairs of the American continents. Starting with this basic principle in mind, they are opposed to any league which impairs this traditional policy. With respect to the war, they declare that we went to war because Germany violated our rights upon the high seas; that the object of the war was the destruction of Prussian militarism because it was a menace to America; that we did not go to war to save France or England, or to "make the world safe for democracy," or to save civilization, but solely for our own self-preservation; that the German armies having been crushed, we have now accomplished the object of the war; and that upon the signing of the treaty of peace we should retire from Europe, leaving the Allies to execute the terms of peace, with possibly this understanding, that if there is another world war which endangers American institutions we will again intervene. They insist that we are under no obligation to the Allies to enforce the terms of peace, and any assumption of such an obligation or any form of league would, in their minds, be a violation of our traditional policy and would involve us in "entangling alliances" in Europe. Hence they are utterly opposed to any league of nations. The war is ended; leave America to look out for her own affairs and Europe to look out for her own affairs is their immovable position.

Then there are others, Mr. President, comprising, I believe, the great mass of the American people, who are convinced that something must be done to prevent future wars, that something must be done to prevent a recurrence of the frightful horrors of the past five years. They want something done. They do not want to leave the world in its old condition, and they favor the league of nations, based upon international cooperation, as the best solution of the problem.

As to whether the league should be ratified in its present form, some are in favor of making no changes, others are in favor of making some reservations, while very many want more light before reaching any conclusion.

Mr. President, the great international problem which confronts the world is the substitution of the reign of law for the reign of force in international disputes. This alone will prevent war. I have always believed that this could be brought about only through an association of nations working together on the principle of cooperation. I am, therefore, in favor of the principles embodied in the league of nations. This does not mean that I have reached a decision that the league should be ratified in the precise form in which it is now presented. This whole subject is one of vast magnitude and of supreme importance to our country, and there are several provisions in the league covenant which call for a full discussion and a most careful consideration by the Senate.

Mr. President, there has been much controversy over the question whether the league should not be separated from the peace treaty and considered at some future time, and this separation has been regarded by many as of vital importance. As for myself, I have always believed the league to be inseparable from the peace treaty, because the treaty can not be enforced except through the league. The treaty declares a basis of settlement. It actually settles little or nothing. It only provides a method of settlement which will take years to carry into effect. Germany is held in bondage for a generation. Austria and Turkey will be stripped of all but fragments of their former territory. New nations have been created from the ruins of great empires. The peace treaty leaves the world on fire, with national aspirations unsatisfied, territorial limits undefined, racial conflicts impending, and with incipient wars already started. This has been a war of continents, and in the enforcement of the terms of peace the whole of Africa and most of Europe, Asia, and the American Continent are affected. It is manifest, therefore, that the league of nations can not be divorced from the execution of the terms of peace. This was a World War, and this situation necessitates a world settlement through the league of nations. America can not divorce the league from the peace treaty. There are only two courses open to us: We can remain in the league and become responsible for the enforcement of the terms of peace or we can quit Europe and notify the Allies that our responsibility is at an end. But if it is unthinkable for us to desert England, France, and Italy when the world is in chaos, we must become a member of the league as providing the only machinery for the restoration of peace and order.

Mr. President, the broad lines of this league are simple. It is well known, as pointed out by ex-Senator Root, that European conferences have several times averted a general European war, as, for instance, the conference of Algeciras in 1906 and the conference of London in 1912. The trouble, however, was that these conferences were voluntary, that no nation was obliged to call one, and no nation was obliged to attend one when called. Now the league makes these conferences obligatory. I regard this as the fundamental feature in the prevention of war. This whole scheme of averting war finally rests upon the good understanding and the exercise of good faith among the nations, and nothing will contribute more to these ends than conferences when the peace of the world is threatened.

So with regard to the settlement of international disputes by arbitration. Everything done heretofore in this line has been on the voluntary principle. No doubt many disputes have been adjusted by arbitration, and America has taken the lead of other nations in this peaceful method of settling international differences and in entering into arbitration treaties. Still no method has hitherto prevailed which compelled nations to submit their disputes to some form of arbitration or investigation and report before going to war. This method at least causes delay and gives time for discussion and the cooling down of the passions. The provisions of the league with respect to arbitration or investigation and report have been criticized as not strong enough, but they clearly will tend to prevent war. No member of the league is likely to violate these provisions and suffer the penalty of an economic boycott or possible armed intervention by the other members of the league.

As to disarmament, the machinery provided by the league will undoubtedly bring about such a reduction of armaments that they will no longer prove a menace to international peace. As I have already said, I consider obligatory conferences, compulsory arbitration or investigation and report before commencing war, and reduction of armaments the three great features of the league which will tend to prevent war.

As to the general objection that the league creates a superstate and hence is destructive of our independence and sovereignty, I am unable to see the force of the arguments in support of this proposition. A superstate can not be formed when every material power that is exercised by the league requires the unanimous consent of the executive council or of the delegates. By reason of this provision and the provision of retirement from the league upon giving two years' notice, the league is more in the nature of a voluntary association. And in this connection it should not be forgotten that in a world composed of a family of nations there is no such thing as absolute sovereignty.

Nor am I impressed with the constitutional objections. The Supreme Court has never held a treaty unconstitutional. The treaty-making power under the Constitution is of the broadest character and it includes everything that is properly covered by the term "treaty" and is not in conflict with some express provision of the Constitution. The Constitution says that—all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

It thus recognizes all treaties then in existence as well as all subsequent treaties made under the authority of the United States. When the Constitution mentions that Congress is given certain powers, it is dealing with the distribution of powers between the General Government and the States. This, however, does not exclude the treaty-making power from exercising many of the powers conferred on Congress. Take, for example, the power conferred on Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations. This does not exclude the treaty-making power from entering into treaties which regulate commerce. There are scores of such treaties. And so with the power of Congress to levy duties; there are many treaties which regulate duties. While the treaty-making power has never been extended to embrace a declaration of war, it has been extended to guarantee the independence of a foreign State such as Panama, which means intervention or war on the part of the United States in case the independence of such foreign State is threatened. Treaties can not, of course, take away the powers vested in Congress under the Constitution, though they may impose obligations on Congress to carry them out. Some treaties are self-executing and require no action by Congress, while others require some action, as, for example, if a treaty called for the payment of a certain sum of money. A treaty is a contract between sovereign States, and it has the force of a statute. From these observations it is manifest that any provisions of the league which may call for an economic boycott or possibly armed intervention by the United States would require the action of Congress before they could be carried into effect.

Mr. President, there has been much discussion concerning the league of nations, and the controversy seems to have settled down to the proposition whether the covenant shall be ratified in its present form or with certain reservations. I believe the popular sentiment is universal, and I certainly share it, that the Monroe doctrine should be clearly safeguarded. This is purely an American doctrine, and it differentiates the New World from the Old. I also believe that domestic questions, like immigration, which in some of their aspects may be international, should be properly safeguarded. The storm center of these reservations seems to be article 10. As to the retention of this article much may be said on both sides. It may be argued that the United States ought not to bind itself for all time to guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of the members of the league against external aggression, and yet that argument might not apply with the same force to protecting the territorial settlements made by the peace conference until this new world order is fully established and the present peace of the world made secure. There is a wide distinction between a temporary and a permanent retention of article 10. Upon the question of reservations I reserve my judgment for a full discussion and consideration.

Mr. President, the peace treaty and the league have now been submitted to the Senate. The issues involved are momentous. The fate of America and mankind is in our hands. The country and the world are looking to the Senate for a calm and dispassionate consideration of these great questions, knowing full well the grave responsibility which rests upon us under the Constitution of the United States.

JAPANESE CONTROL OF SHANTUNG.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the league of nations, therefore, appears from the view of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to be a voluntary organization possessed of involuntary and arbitrary powers. This of itself is a solecism and a most anomalous creation, both nationally and internationally. It seems, however, Mr. President, that we are still living on earth among earthy things. We have not yet reached the millennium, unless it be a psychological one, nor are we dealing with demigods or angels. We are still dealing with human nature as we find it on this earth, somewhat erring at times, but nevertheless possessed of vast hope and optimism, and struggling along the highway of human progress year by year and century by century toward a better course and better things.

However, I can not believe that a psychological millennium will affect well the practical affairs of mankind. Only yesterday blood was shed in Fiume. Only a short time before that we had a 4th day of July; and as preliminary to the discussion of articles 156, 157, and 158 of the treaty I desire to recite the current history of the 4th day of July, 1919, as it affects the peaceable dispositions of mankind.

A certain portion of our people are suffering from verbal delusions. They mistake words for facts and phrases for elemental principles. It is a species of self-hypnotism. There are always people who are good subjects for traveling mesmerists and the crop is unusually heavy just now. We are living among the sunlit peaks of a glorious idealism, with a serene contempt for the changeless laws of nature or our own selves. Our beloved President is sounding the accepted slogans for the grand army of star gazers. All alike are heedless of their feet, and are even now stumbling and falling in the ditches with monotonous regularity.

Several years ago a business depression was described by the President as a psychological condition, and we were bidden to be of good cheer and change the state of our minds. It is so with evangelizing the world. Universal peace will be ushered in by wishing it, and savage, warlike nations instantly lie down by the still waters in green pastures by listening to a few homilies on their wicked ways. Thus we are lulled with documents and soothed into trustful sleep by the promises of our seven-months-absent President. Europe's atmosphere clings to his person. He brings with him the choicest products of Old World diplomacy compounded of the intrigues of Europe and the perfidy of oriental deception mitigated by wholesale robbery of millions of people and hundreds of millions of territory and property.

The league of nations is the colossal confidence game of the ages. Of all its miserable dupes the American and the Chinese peoples are bound by a common misfortune in the superlative degree as proposed victims. China, a mighty, untrained, pacifist nation, is helpless before military Japan. The United States is either betrayed or a victim of incompetence at Paris. Unless we train our military force, we, too, will suffer partition and benevolent absorption by those who claim we are unable to exclude their enemies from our borders. Both are on the brink of perpetual servitude to nations their superiors in diplomacy or arms.

All this is heralded as the millennium. War is no more and peace is secured by crushing every nation that questions the existing order of human affairs. This power rests in three hands, two of whom control. Fiat peace and virtue abound springing from the league of nations. Nations are thereby reborn and purged of all evil. The psychological millennium has arrived. Actual occurrences, however, in an unideal world grate harshly on our ears.

Let me tell the Senate—and if there is a Member in it who can afford to speak his sentiments and tell the truth, I believe he now has the floor—only yesterday the report is, by this morning's cablegrams, that Great Britain withdrew from the Vatican her envoy, who has been there for several years. That of itself is a recognition of political power in an ecclesiastical organization. A papal envoy has been for years—I say "years"; since the beginning of the war it has occurred—from the Vatican itself in London. London papers—the London Spectator, the London Star, the London Times, the ancient "thunderer" from the days of Napoleon—all of them have commented upon this change. A vast unrest is found among the British people because of it. I do not state it simply as a criticism, but I state it as a profound departure from the policies of Great Britain since the days of Henry VIII. Not since the days of that wife-murdering monarch has there been a papal envoy sitting in London from the Vatican. Still we go along serenely oblivious of these changes. I speak of them as political changes of a vital character in the mechanism of nations, and I believe it to be true. To note the recognition of political power in an ecclesiastical organization is not an attack on the church. It is to advise the public of impending change.

Mr. President, I read among the signatory nations, the 32 original elect, the name of Peru. It is one of the 45—32 original signatory nations, and 13 invited. At 3 o'clock—inopportune time, indeed—on the morning of the 4th of July, 1919, two regiments of soldiers rushed in on the palace of the President at Lima, seized by force Señor Don José Pardo, President of Peru, in his private office at that unseemly hour, and immediately conveyed him to the penitentiary, where they confined him, with the principal members of his cabinet. He remained in close confinement until last week, when he was put aboard a launch and headed for an ocean-going steamship, so that he might go into exile and never more trouble the gentlemen who took the trouble to depose him. I shall observe with mild curiosity what our President thinks of it—if it is a summary method of disposing of cabinets.

Two soldiers and three civilians were killed. While the slaughter was far from satisfactory for a coup d'etat in such a Republic, the principle of self-determination of a free people is felt to be sufficiently vindicated.

It is almost superfluous to say that Peru had an election for President last May with two candidates in the field. As usual, both candidates claimed to be elected. Neither could believe the people would refuse to avail themselves of an offer to serve them. They were nearly as sure of this as Henry Ford was in Michigan. President Pardo was maintaining the status quo while the contest was pending before the Peruvian Congress for hearing July 28. Senor Augusto Leguia, candidate of the independent party, claimed four-fifths of the votes were cast for him. A conspiracy was on foot to defeat, he said, the will of the people in the contested election. President Pardo was alleged to favor the seating of Senor Aspillaga, who was Senor Leguia's rival candidate in the May election. Senor Leguia knew what an unfriendly administration can do in an election contest and countered with two regiments of soldiers while it was yet time.

The provisional government of Senor Leguia is in possession of all public offices. He is a constructive statesman of liberal views. He is opposed to revolutions, and only resorted to force to vindicate free government. President Pardo had a rubber-stamp congress of executive echoes and had packed the election committee against him. President Pardo will be tried for violating the constitution and conspiring against the institutions of his country. A responsive chord will be touched among us when we learn the first thing President Liguia did was to establish a strict telegraph and cable censorship. It is believed among Peruvian diplomats such a graceful recognition of United States customs will secure prompt recognition of the palace revolutionaries. The Tinoco revolution in Costa Rica, however, was denied recognition by President Wilson, as he thinks such methods of settling a campaign fracas ought to be frowned on.

An embarrassing feature of Leguia's rude interference with the election contest was breaking off a Fourth of July celebration arranged by the American Legation at Lima. The reign of universal peace vouchsafed by the league of nations was to have been celebrated in speech and song with floats, international flags, and music. All invitations to sit on the platform were canceled and the American colony stayed off the plaza all day. The only familiar event was a speech by the revolutionary President Leguia from the balcony of the palace he captured before daylight that morning. He eloquently defended the league of nations, and declared the only way to have peace in Peru was to run his enemies out of the country or keep them in jail.

That is exactly what the league of nations says. The only mitigating circumstance to Americans in Peru is the country is not yet gone bone dry and they are philosophically availing themselves of this advantage denied home folks.

Even the way, sensational as it is, of settling election contests in Peru did not close the Fourth of July, the natal day of the greatest Republic on earth. Willard met Dempsey that day for the first time in the universal peace era. Willard has solved the question of permanent peace. He expects to return to Kansas as soon as he can stand the motion of the train. Utah scores heavily and the sunflower State must now depend on Vic Murdock to keep in the press reports. The wretched sarcasm of events never dealt so heavy a blow to idealism as the fistic affair on the Erie shore.

Here is what happened: In Toledo, Ohio, July 4, 1919, a prize fight occurred authorized by the law of that State. The law does not refer to it as a prize fight. It is just another case of self-deception. A boxing match sounds better, sparring contest better yet, and a physical contest of muscular development really makes one almost search Wilson's New Freedom for details. The cold daylight truth is, it was a brutal beast of a fight. The front page of the public press carried the headline limits. The league of nations was itself knocked out of first place by something it deprecates or denies. We read of left hooks, of terrific batterings, of punches in the stomach, of Willard knocked down five times hanging helplessly on the ropes, one eye swelled shut and the other on the way to rest, while his knees sagged and a far-away look was noted in what could be seen of his last receding eye, rocking on his heels with quivering body, the blood pouring from his mouth. Again, we are regaled with a cut under Willard's eye, his face a battered mass, rapid-fire pile-driving swings which left him dazed and staggering about the ring and wabbling into the ropes where he collapsed in his chair with his left jaw dislocated and some of his teeth knocked out. He was covered with blood as he was carried out of the ring. It was indeed a day of triumph at Toledo, a more amazing moral boxing exhibition, punching the stomach, knocking out teeth, and otherwise committing mayhem, assault with intent to do great bodily injury, and other felonies too numerous to mention. The Roman contests of gladiators, Spanish bull fights, and game cocks vary only in degree. The bulls and chickens can not help it. Men make them fight. The captive gladiators killed each other and the survivor was set at liberty while we save him to beat up others until he takes the count. So the cycle of punching stomachs, breaking jaws, and knocking out teeth and eyes goes on in a free country, among a people who lead the world in peace.

I should like some time to have the account of the Dempsey-Willard fight printed at length in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD opposite the address of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The advantage so far lies with the gladiators, the bulls, and the game cocks. The Toledo affair was a statutory fight draped with a euphonious name. A disgraceful, barbarous animal affair, it is to be explained only by remembering the country went dry three days before and the beast in us had to work out some way. What distresses me is to have all these uncivilized things happen just as the President comes home with the league of nations and universal peace. Just as we begin to pass under the influence of a psychological millennium men who lack vision in Peru and Ohio, to quote from the President's last message, shock us back into a world of cold unideal realities.

Mr. President, leaving this matter, which is merely as an introduction to reach actual affairs, I now take up the question of the Shantung territory covered by this treaty as it affects China and the rest of the world.

I read from volume 1 of Malloy's Treaties, page 212. We have manufactured many philanthropic documents in the last eight months. However, in 1858 we entered into a treaty with China. I read from article 1 of the treaty of peace, amity, and commerce of the year named:

> There shall be, as there have always been, peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Ta Tsing Empire and between their people, respectively. They shall not insult or oppress each other for any trifling cause so as to produce an estrangement between them, and if any other nation should act unjustly or oppressively the United States will exert their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement of the question, thus showing their friendly feeling.

This is an existing treaty, possessed of vitality and promise. Therefore it becomes our duty under article 1, when informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement of the question, thus showing our friendly feeling. I believe it the duty of the Senate so to do. It is the duty of the Senate to discuss articles 156, 157, and 158 of the treaty in order if possible to mitigate the hardships that may fall upon a friendly power. Let us act in the spirit of this treaty, to the end that our friend may not have trusted us in vain.

China has given evidence of her confidence in us for many years. She has trusted our good faith; she has confided in our promises to her. She went into the war; she gave of her men, some 300,000 serving behind the lines. They are not trained. She is a nonmilitary nation. She gave of her men to render every nonmilitary service requested. She gave fully according to the requirements made by the Allies and their associated nations. She trusted us. The question is whether that trust has been well reposed and our good faith will be shown in this transaction.

I now read from page 1046 of the same volume, from what is ordinarily known as the Root-Takahira notes. The language of each is practically the same. It is an exchange of views between the United States of America and Japan. The notes declare:

> 1. It is the wish of the two Governments to encourage the free and peaceful development of their commerce on the Pacific Ocean.
> 3. They are accordingly firmly resolved reciprocally to respect the territorial possessions belonging to each other in said region.
> 4. They are also determined to preserve the common interest of all powers in China by supporting by all pacific means at their disposal the independence and integrity of China and the principles of equal opportunity for commerce and industry of all nations in that Empire.

This will be of some consequence in view of later developments.

I now read from Overlach on Foreign Financial Control in China, page 187. Referring to Japan's activities in 1914 and subsequent years when she entered the war and began active operations against Germany in China, this author says:

> When Japan took possession of the territory originally leased to Germany she did so as the representative of Great Britain and her European allies. At that time Count Okuma claimed that: "Every sense of loyalty and honor obliges Japan to cooperate with Great Britain to clear from these waters the enemies who in the past, the present, and the future menace her interests, her trade, her shipping, and her people's lives." And the Japanese foreign office addresses the United States as follows: "Aside from the history of the seizure of the place by Germany and her conduct dating back to and including her intervention, in conjunction with Russia and France after the Chino-Japanese war, it is absolutely necessary to eliminate such possession completely if Japan is to restore immediately complete peace in the Far East in accordance with the terms of the Anglo-Japanese alliance."

Again I read, from page 213 of the same author, from the message of President Wilson in 1913 at the time the American banking group were compelled by the moral suasion exercised to withdraw from the contemplated loan in China. This loan, it will be remembered, had been developed under the auspices of Mr. Calhoun, who was the minister to China representing this Government in that and prior years. He returned to this country successful in the negotiation of the loan. The American banks had made the necessary arrangements to advance the sums required. At that time, however, they approached, before finally parting with their funds, President Wilson to know whether the moral support and approval of the United States Government would be given to the enterprise. He denied it. He used the following language:

> The conditions of the loan seem to us to touch very nearly the administrative independence of China itself, and this administration does not feel that it ought, even by implication, to be a party to those conditions. The responsibility on its part which would be implied in requesting the bankers to undertake the loan might conceivably go the length in some unhappy contingence of forcible interference in the financial and even the political affairs of that great oriental State, just now awakening to a consciousness of its power and of its obligations to its people. The conditions include not only the pledging of particular taxes, some of them antiquated and burdensome, to secure the loan, but also the administration of these taxes by foreign agents. The responsibility on the part of our Government implied in the encouragement of a loan thus secured and administered is plain enough and is obnoxious to the principles upon which the Government of our people rests. * * * Our interests are those of the open door—a door of friendship and mutual advantage. This is the only door we care to enter.

What a tremendous change has come over the spirit of the President's dreams since!

Keeping this in mind, then, Mr. President, I now read from the treaty of Paris of June 28, 1919. I quote the article relating to the Shantung treaty from section 8, articles 156, 157, and 158:

SECTION VIII.

SHANTUNG.

ARTICLE 156.

> Germany renounces, in favor of Japan, all her rights, title, and privileges—particularly those concerning the territory of Kiaochow, railways, mines, and submarine cables—which she acquired in virtue of the treaty concluded by her with China on March 6, 1898, and of all other arrangements relative to the Province of Shantung.
> All German rights in the Tsingtau-Tsinan Railway, including its branch lines, together with its subsidiary property of all kinds, stations, shops, fixed and rolling stock, mines, plant and material for the exploitation of the mines, are and remain acquired by Japan, together with all rights and privileges attaching thereto.
> The German State submarine cables from Tsingtau to Shanghai and from Tsingtau to Chefoo, with all the rights, privileges, and properties attaching thereto, are similarly acquired by Japan, free and clear of all charges and encumbrances.

ARTICLE 157.

> The movable and immovable property owned by the German State in the territory of Kiaochow, as well as all the rights which Germany might claim in consequence of the works or improvements made or of the expenses incurred by her, directly or indirectly, in connection with this territory, are and remain acquired by Japan, free and clear of all charges and encumbrances.

ARTICLE 158.

> Germany shall hand over to Japan within three months from the coming into force of the present treaty the archives, registers, plans, title deeds, and documents of every kind, wherever they may be, relating to the administration, whether civil, military, financial, judicial, or other, of the territory of Kiaochow.
> Within the same period Germany shall give particulars to Japan of all treaties, arrangements, or agreements relating to the rights, title, or privileges referred to in the two preceding articles.

What is the limit, Mr. President, which these rights give to Japan in point of time? How long will she keep this territory, these port cities? Is this merely a temporary exercise of the rights and privileges gained under these three articles? So far as it appears from the treaty there is no time limit. The occupancy of that territory lasts so long as human government may remain upon earth. This morning the cablegrams report that a distinguished Japanese diplomatic authority in Paris says their occupany is temporary only; that the Japanese Government proposes to relinquish in a reasonable time all the rights acquired in Shantung under these three articles. If that is true, then no reason appears in the Senate why those articles in the treaty should be ratified. On the contrary, an express reservation or even a specific repudiation ought to be made in the Senate of those three articles relating to an ancient and friendly country.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that he is placing the proper interpretation upon the treaty when he asserts that the rights conferred by this treaty upon Japan will endure as long as human government lasts? The Senator will take into account the fact that Germany's rights were such as were derived from her treaty with China in 1898, and under that treaty her rights in the Shantung Peninsula were limited to 99 years. Twenty years of that period have elapsed. Her rights ipso facto would terminate at the expiration of the 99-year period. Obviously when she concedes or yields her rights under this treaty or any other instrument she could not dispose of more than that which she had. Therefore, under this treaty Japan's rights, conceding that she took all of Germany's rights, would be only those of Germany, and Germany's rights expiring at the expiration of practically 70 years from now, certainly Japan's rights would terminate at that time, assuming that in some other instrument she has not limited her rights under this treaty and assuming that she has not by some other arrangement agreed to terminate her rights sooner than the period to which I have referred. Does not the Senator think that his statement is entirely too broad in assuming that Japan's rights are in perpetuity?

Mr. SHERMAN. I had the 99-year limit in mind in the original leasehold, as it is called, made by the Chinese Government to Germany in 1898, following the war of 1897 and 1898, and intended to come to it in due time later on, but I will anticipate that by taking it up now. I do not think my statement is too broad.

For what Germany considered to be good cause she declared war against China. It was not, according to our standards, a cause to wage war. The missionaries were killed by a fanatical outburst in this Province. This Province is the most ancient of all Chinese civilization. Shantung is the home of Confucius and the home of many other Chinese teachers and patriots, running back through many hundreds of years, who have given the doctrine of pacificism to the Chinese people. The dust of Confucius is mingled some place with Mother Earth in the Province of Shantung. It is to the Chinaman holy ground. If there is anything in all that vast unknown Empire that appeals to the ancient memories and the ancient glories of their people, it is this Province. These two missionaries, two Roman Catholic priests, were killed by ignorant fanatics in this Province. The priests were subjects of the Kaiser. It was at most a matter for negotiation by diplomats or national agents to settle in some satisfactory way this breach of international rights. We have had literally hundreds of our citizens killed brutally in a bordering Republic without a solitary protest on the part of this administration, without war save an impotent expedition, in which we were finally told there that three directions of the compass we could not travel, and one, directly north, we could. We did not go to war, and have not gone to war yet. Great Britain has had her subjects slain in various quarters of the globe, and only exacts reparation and guaranties for future safety. She does not go to war at all times for such causes.

Germany, however, in 1898, following our unfortunate expedition in the Philippine Islands, had a portion of her naval force in the far Pacific. When these missionaries were murdered she immediately made it the pretext—I do not say made it the cause but the pretext—to clear for action in Chinese waters. She sent her battleships within gunshot of the port cities. She delivered an ultimatum to the Chinese authorities. She treated it as if armed intervention in German affairs was necessary in the Orient. She treated it as the act of a nation, this act of a few ignorant fanatics in an outburst of vicious religious prejudice.

When the immediate granting of their demands did not come, Germany proceeded to threaten the landing of forces and the desolation of Chinese Provinces. The Chinese Government yielded. The result of this surrender and settlement was the lease of 1898, to which the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has alluded. It was a lease for 99 years. It secured territorial rights, mining rights, concessions, and franchises for railways. Germany remained in possession until she was ejected by armed Japanese forces after the declaration of war in 1914. Japan, having some friendly relations with one of the Allies, Great Britain, under the Anglo-Japanese treaty, entered into an understanding finally by which she made war upon Germany and drove her out of her Chinese possessions. In 1915 and 1917 such an understanding was had that before Japan finally ceased her efforts she was guaranteed protection and safety in the future peace treaty for the Chinese possessions which she had taken from Germany. Twenty years or more had elapsed of that 99 years, leaving some 78 years under the unexpired lease.

Let me briefly trace the conduct of Japan since she has taken possession of those rights. Nothing indicates that her possession has a time limit upon it. She has seized the ports, the railways, the mines, and is exercising every concession that belonged to the lease directly or indirectly. She has even in addition to that gone beyond those rights, I believe, seizing other territory and property rights that do not properly belong to the lease.

Let me now refer to Japan's condition.

She is an island nation. She has a limited number of square miles. Her population now reaches near 55,000,000. For many years, up to within the last century, she had no territory on the mainland in Asia. Her possessions began with Korea, with her claims in Manchuria. They have extended, under various pretenses, over both of those countries, although originally the promise was for temporary occupation. Every treaty which has been made public to which Japan's signature, by her accredited representatives, is attached, guarantees the territorial integrity of China. Every treaty, either made at the end of war or in diplomatic negotiations, under which Japan has entered on the Continent of Asia provides for a limited time for the occupation of the territory seized. Japan will not vacate Korea. She will not vacate Manchuria. Japan will not vacate Formosa. Japan will not vacate a square foot of soil on the mainland of Asia over which she has military power or her jurisdiction has extended unless she be driven off by force of arms.

It is her history, it is her diplomatic conduct, for 40 years at least, that when she has entered upon territory on the Continent of Asia, obtained possession of it, and planted her posts and military forces on that soil she remains there and flatly refuses to recede or to surrender. Because of that, because she seized the leasehold of Russia at Port Arthur, following on her difficulty, ending in 1905, with the Russian Government, because she has steadily gathered territorial rights by negotiation, by conquest, by every means known to her, and refused steadfastly to let go of a square mile of province she has gained on the mainland, I have come to the conclusion that when she obtains possession under a 79-year unexpired lease she will allow this part of the treaty to go the way of her other treaties. Why does not Japan restore to China her rightful possessions now? China was robbed by Germany in 1898. Why rob her again, and this time in the house of her supposed friends? Why do not Great Britain and the United States keep Alsace-Lorraine? It would be as just.

But it is very easy in this Chamber to end the argument. Let us, by a reservation, limit the rights of Japan to 79 years, and call upon her to stipulate that at the end of that time she will surrender possession. Even this is confirming the wrong of Germany. If justice is not stillborn in the league of nations, return it to China. Why not have put it in the treaty, in articles 156, 157, and 158? It would have been easily done; but, like the Monroe doctrine reservation, it remains for the Senate to make the objection and require the stipulation to be inserted in the document itself. That is the reason why I think the Senate ought to take action.

Every improvement, every move made by Japan in Shantung, indicates permanent occupation. All of the improvements made in the harbor, every public building, every dry dock, every pier, every military hospital, every barrack that has been erected indicates a permanent occupation, because they are of a permanent character. There are no temporary improvements. They all indicate a settled purpose on the part of Japan to remain where she now is.

Again, a mere leasehold right gives no right to Japan to exercise sovereignty, to land armies, to garrison forts, to build up the great port cities, and to fortify the harbors. These are rights of sovereignty, and these are rights that Japan is now exercising over a leasehold right she has acquired.

Again, it seems to me that we ought not to ratify by our conduct here a leasehold right extorted from China by force of arms. No country gives up spheres of influence within its territorial limits voluntarily. They only surrender by force. China parted with Shantung to Germany because Germany's guns threatened the desolation of her Provinces. Anything extorted by force, when the robber no longer can hold possession, calls upon every civilized government exercising good faith to restore the extorted, robbed property to the victim. Instead of joining here to perpetuate the remaining 79 years in Japan, we ought to join here to restore this property, stolen at the muzzle of German guns, to the nation despoiled, and a friendly power to us for many years.

Let me suggest, we know the condition in which this property and territory is. We know how it was acquired from the country that originally owned it in 1897, parting with it in 1898. If we permit another power to seize this property with this knowledge on our part, we become accomplices, even for the 79-year unexpired term of the lease. If we permit this, we have guilty knowledge; and we help, by ratifying the treaty with these articles in it, to pass this property from China, the original owner of this territory and sovereign over this domain. We help by our votes to pass stolen property into the hands of an alien power.

There is an old maxim about criminal courts that the accomplice who aids to pass stolen property through the hands of either the original criminal or others, knowing it to be stolen, becomes an accomplice; and the receiver of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, is equally guilty with the original criminal. That maxim applies here, and I think it well to invoke it at this time, to see that justice may be done.

Let us consider how the methods of framing the treaty and the motives of men have been influnced. Is it any better than the negotiations of old? Can we examine the motives of men at the Paris peace conference and find that they are any more exalted than those of former years? What has Great Britain received? Colonies in Africa. She has received the spoils of successful war, and, further, she has received article 10 in the league of nations, which guarantees that we, with our military and naval force, will undertake to protect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity of all the member nations of the league, including England. That is worth something.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator complain of the acquisition of territory in Africa by British colonies in South Africa? Does the Senator think that the United States ought to have taken possession of any of the German colonies there? And if not, who is better prepared to assume the control and administration of German colonies in South Africa than the English Crown possessions in South Africa?

Let me say, before the Senator answers that question, that he will recall that Great Britain, before the treaty was entered into, earnestly urged that the United States become a mandatory for the German colonies in South Africa. There was a very strong feeling among our people that we ought not to become a mandatory of any of the territory which the Senator denominates the spoils of war. I am not so sure that that sentiment was not well-nigh universal, and I am inclined to think that it was well founded. But some disposition had to be made of the colonies of Germany. Obviously, Germany ought not to have received back those African possessions. She had murdered the inhabitants, the aborigines, of those African colonies. She had reduced the number from several thousand, and in one or two instances several hundred thousand, to a minimum. She had subjected them to slavery intolerable, and to atrocities and brutalities that no one can defend. Clearly those colonies ought not to have been restored to her. Somebody had to take possession of them. I think Great Britain acted magnanimously. She desired some other nation to become a mandatory, but no nation desired to become a mandatory; at least, our Nation did not; and it seems to me the Senator ought not to complain because in South Africa some of the German colonies have passed now to the Crown of Great Britain or to one of her colonial dependencies.

Does the Senator suggest any different policy, any different method of dealing with the South African German colonies, than that which was pursued by the peace conference?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I fear the Senator has not wholly appreciated my comments. I am not in a censorious mood because Great Britain has received the German East African colonies. It is a happy riddance for us. I am opposed to any mandatory in any of the great continents on the other side of the world or across the Atlantic Ocean. However, Great Britain is an adept at always appearing to be a philanthropist. She is now appearing to be a philanthropist in taking these colonies whose population had been abused, as the Senator from Utah says. I think some very gross abuses had been practiced, but we could not administer their affairs. Great Britain knew that we would decline, and would suggest and very readily agree to her administering the affairs of these colonies, so she took them with a spirit of great self-denial and sacrifice. Now, notwithstanding that the greater part of us in this Chamber are of English blood or origin, directly or indirectly, and that our language and laws and literature are very kindred, that ought not to blind us to matters that are of some consequence to us.

Great Britain undertook to administer the affairs of the German colonies in East Africa. I am not complaining about her doing so; I am glad she did; but I need do no more than remind the Senator from Utah that Great Britain has had a protectorate in Egypt for many years. Twenty-five or thirty or more years ago the man known in the Far East as Chinese Gordon went up the Nile to Khartoum. At that time England was just beginning to exercise her protectorate rights in Egypt successfully. After Gordon reached Khartoum his force was surrounded and cut to pieces because of a lack of sufficient support. Kitchener came in a few years, drove out the Arabs that destroyed the British forces, established an orderly government, took possession and administered affairs, and left a civil officer in control. Great Britain has had her Cape colonies for years. If Great Britain's history is followed, it will be found that whenever gold and diamonds are discovered in any country in the world she is always ready to be the philanthropist and administer affairs for that country. She often finds it proper to maintain the blessings of English civilization in such lands. She has been a philanthropic enterprise in Cape Town from the time the white man found that gold existed there in profitable quantities.

From the time the Kimberley diamond mines were discovered, when Cecil Rhodes dreamed his great dream of empire, she has sent her soldiers and her men into South Africa to establish her paramount rights where vast treasures are dug from the bowels of the earth. Of course, it has been concealed and draped with a euphonious philanthropy. It is to see that the blessings of Christianity reach the benighted heathen, to see that the Hottentot should no longer live in his primeval hut, and, incidentally, that the resources of the country, including the precious stones and the metal I have suggested, might be developed for the benefit of mankind.

Here were the two extremes, Mr. President. I am not complaining about it, but I am stating that profit and philanthropy frequently go hand in hand with England; and it is so in the league of nations. Beginning up near the waters of Aboukir, where Nelson destroyed the French fleet in the time of Napoleon, following the Nile, with all her explorations in the days of Livingstone and Stanley, she pushed into the far interior. She built a railway from the mouth of the Nile to Khartoum. It was first a military road, built by Kitchener in that noted expedition. They went far into the interior. They passed the Equator. They carried English settlements and English commerce on the way. From below, from the Cape Town country, they were pushing north. They were building railroads. Between those two colonies in the extreme north and south of the Dark Continent there lay the German Provinces, not of any great value in a commercial sense, but from the strategic standpoint, from their military significance, they meant a world to the Empire of England in Africa. The German colonies thrust their wedge between. The very railroads that came to the German Provinces were not allowed to connect their irons with the railroads outside, so that neither freight nor passenger cars could travel or be transferred or switched from a British railroad to the railroads within the German territory.

That was for military purposes. It is true the Germans treated the natives brutally. They are not the only Europeans who have that history. In the days of King Leopold the Kongo horrors shame and pale into insignificance even the cruelties of the Germans in Belgium. Still we said nothing. The philanthropic instincts of England were not aroused, because they did not concern her territory.

The war came and we had the peace treaty written at Paris. Bear in mind, I am not complaining; I am stating the facts in their orderly development. When it was suggested that Germany should lose her chief African provinces Great Britain said nothing. France talked; the representatives of the United States talked; Italy talked; Belgium talked; but Great Britain said nothing. After a convenient interval of discussion one day the representative of the Australian Government was suddenly heard on the question, and he objected to Germany keeping her far Pacific islands or her colonies in East Africa. He claimed it was a menace to the Australian Government. New Zealand in like manner so insisted. Therefore Great Britain after a while presented herself as willing for the sacrifice.

Not since the day when Great Britain entered upon the Egyptian protectorate has there been anything so convenient and opportune to further her purposes of African empire as the seizing of these colonies. Her dream of the Cape-to-Cairo railroad can now be realized. With the exception of the gap between the rails in the German territory, practically those roads are now built. They are ready for operation with the resumption of peace. This removes the last obstacle, and Great Britain can now run her railway trains from Cape Town to Cairo unobstructed, unmolested by any foreign enemy.

So I say I do not complain; that we ought not to administer these colonies as a trustee for their affairs; and that England has taken them because she is best qualified to do so. She is a great administrator of colonial dependencies; she has had the experience of 150 years, and we have had none, practically; it is contrary to the form and the genius of our Government, anyhow. We willingly saw England take them. I make no criticism, but I state the fact that it was extremely opportune and convenient to England's purposes for her to become the mandatory of the German provinces.

I think when Great Britain gets the colonies of East Africa formerly governed by Germany, and gets article 10 by which we undertake to preserve the territorial integrity around the world, she is obtaining a substantial share of the practical worldly loaves and fishes in this treaty.

Again, France is a party to this treaty. She receives Alsace and Lorraine. It is proper for her to take them. They were taken from her in 1870 or 1871. Germany can not complain, because, in the main, their population was French; they spoke the French language; they were of the French blood; they were Germanized by law; they were compelled to speak German in the schools, to speak it in public and on the streets; the records and the laws were written in the German language; and everything that was of French origin was put under the ban. But, nevertheless, Alsace and Lorraine remained French and are French to this day. So France gets substantial recognition in the righting of an ancient wrong. Japan receives her share of the world's loaves and fishes alluded to—Shantung.

If that high sense of justice prevailed in making this treaty which the President would have us believe in his last address delivered in this Chamber and by many texts in former years, Shantung ought to have been handed back to China. It was taken from her by military force; it was the fruit of a shameless robbery; and we, instead of returning it to the victim, return it to an alien power with a 79-year unexpired term of the lease, with no guaranty on their part, pledges, or security of any kind that they will surrender it even at the expiration of that time. We have back of that the uniform history of this same nation since she became a dominant power in the East, on the mainland of Asia, that when she has planted her power upon Asiatic soil she has never yet removed it, and her policy uniformly indicates that she will not do so in this case.

So Japan has Shantung to console her for an inconsiderable sacrifice. How many men lie in their graves as a result of Japan's entry into the war? How many dollars, gold or yen, are spent as a result? How many of her ships are sunk by submarines—unless they were merchant vessels on some mission of trade in other quarters of the world? Few. Practically all her soldiers that lie in their graves to-day were killed in taking Shantung from the Germans.

What does South Africa get? They get Jan Christiaan Smuts and his draft of a peace league. That satisfies their ambition as well as their provincial or national vanity. With four drafts of a peace league, one by this country and three by others, ours was set aside and the one written by the South African statesman of Cape Town was taken as the draft of the league of nations. That ought to satisfy them. The garlands of immortality about his brow is something to gratify.

What has the United States got? Articles 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 19 of the league of nations. Those articles, with the Shantung articles in the peace treaty, Mr. President, prepare a powder magazine in Asia for future explosion. When the eruption comes we will ride high among the predestined victims of this fateful document. The United States practically went into the war claiming little, and we have nothing but air castles as our share of it. Verily the league of nations, as far as it is interwoven with or affected by the peace treaty, is a thing of shreds and patches.

Just as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said a day or two ago, unless checked, China is on the verge of dismemberment. With her more than 300,000,000 people, with 2,000,000 square miles of territory, with vast mines of iron and other minerals, she is on the verge of division and partition among the powers; and articles 156, 157, and 158 are the entering wedges of that oriental dissolution. Poland is restored in Europe the same year China is partitioned in Asia. What a glorious result for us!

Here are the spheres of influence, as given by an Englishman. Great Britain has 28 per cent of the spheres of influence; Russia—and this was before her dissolution of government and present troubles—42 per cent; France, 3 per cent; Germany, 2 per cent; Japan, 5 per cent.

It is said here by the same authority:

> These spheres have been gerrymandered by the war, but the table brings out the secret of Japan's efforts in China—the fear of being excluded from the Continent of Asia. Japan's stern and positive policy toward China has for its aims the protection of Japanese life and property and the safeguarding of Japanese interests.

It is almost unnecessary to have added that; we know it.

Therefore, Mr. President, when we take all these matters together, if we ratify this treaty we set the seal upon the first great division of Chinese territory; we become responsible—directly responsible, not merely morally responsible—by setting our ratification upon this division. History rang for 150 years with the partition of Poland. Let not the future sound with our denunciation as an unholy partner in dividing and destroying China as the first concrete result of the league of nations.

China appeals powerfully to the sympathy and support of the American people. The treaty pending in the Senate is another step in the dismemberment of an ancient empire. This step can be checked either by the United States expressing its emphatic disapproval of articles 156, 157, and 158 or by an awakening of China from her dream of pacifism. China is traveling to the goal to which all nations who will not develop enough military strength for self-defense ultimately go. A vast population for many years has sought safety by peace and by keeping within her own borders. She has disturbed the territory of no other country. She has sought no conquest and been content with her own possessions through the centuries.

Lacking the power to resist aggression, she has been a victim of repeated spoliation. Great Britain has held 410 square miles in Hongkong and vicinity as the English area of influence since 1842, and leases at Weihaiwei 288 square miles since 1898. Great Britain further wields a tremendous influence over the Yangtse Valley and Tibet. China in 1895, at the close of the war with Japan, ceded the island of Formosa, of 13,995 square miles, to Japan. Port Arthur and vicinity was taken by Russia on a leasehold, later comprising 1,362 square miles. Kiaochow leasehold, taken from Germany, together with all the rights appurtenant to it, is the last acquisition of Japan. France has Indo-China-Tonkin territory of 46,000 square miles. Germany's interest is transferred to Japan, and for the present the former disappeared from the Chinese question. Russia transferred her Port Arthur rights to Japan and at present is not a factor in this treaty relating to Shantung. Why China should be exploited, her territory absorbed in the guise of leaseholds, her port cities dominated by alien powers, her mining and railway rights seized by Japan, does not appear, except under the rule of covetous desire coupled with military force. It is a most inauspicious beginning of the substitution of right for might, which is announced to be the basis of the league of nations.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] in his compact and luminous address, fairly summing up what can be said for it, stated that the substance of the league of nations was the substitution of justice for force. If that be so, upon that solemn principle, upon that obligation of our official oaths, let us practically apply the principle in the Shantung Province. If there be justice in this, then indeed has reason fled from the minds of men and we are ruled again, as in the days of old, by might. Governed by justice and not by force! If we could photograph the minds of the men in this conference as they voted on the numerous bargains and concessions and log-rollings made to finally arrive at some conclusion, there is as little excuse for some of the conduct as anything that ever emanated from the Congress of Vienna.

It has been admitted on the floor of the Senate Chamber that Shantung was given to Japan to pacify her and keep her in the league of nations and procure her consent to the treaty and to the league of peace. That practically is the argument. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] stated that some concessions had to be made. That is true; but they ought to be concessions that do not involve international grand larceny of territorial possession. No compromise can be made upon things that are eternal in their injustice. Justice is not a matter of barter and compromise. Compromise can be made upon matters that are not vital to continued sovereignty and independence of a powerful country, of our ancient friends, of a nation that we asked to join this league, with her three hundred millions of people; and she only drew her mantle about her, in the dignity of her insulted pride, and refuses to attach her signature either to the treaty or to the league. I honor China's name for it. A great race of pacifists, following the principles of their philosophers and teachers of the early days, they have consistently lived, except for internal revolutions of their own, at peace with the world.

Indeed, why did Great Britain sign it? It is said that Great Britain thought but little of the league of nations. Why did she sign it? Because of article 10, another concession, that this powerful Republic, with her great established credit in the markets of the world, with her great military force, with her potential resources in the soil to feed and victual great armies, might, under article 10, guarantee her territorial possessions every place in the globe with our blood and our treasure. That is why she signed it. That is another concession that I commend to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] as a matter of compromise, compromising away the life and treasure of our own country. How many hundreds of thousands of our men, how many hundreds of thousands of the boys yet in their cradle, helpless infants, are bargained into hopeless military servitude under a foreign sun in battle under article 10, to defend Great Britain's territory, with her mines of diamonds, of gold, her territorial possessions, and her wide-flung commerce around the globe? We pay the price. That is another concession if we ratify the league, and that I commend not only to the Senator from Mississippi but to the people of all our country. God grant it may not return to desolate our homes and burden our taxable resources in the years to come.

France so far has received no bribe; Belgium no bribe. They fought for self-preservation. Will we receive any share of this indemnity from Germany? Not a pound sterling. It will be divided among some of those countries, properly between Belgium and France, to rehabilitate, to rebuild their devastated provinces; properly to Great Britain. I do not complain. Let them have it. But we receive neither territory nor treasure for the taxes we have paid and for the lives we have sacrificed. Not an American grave under European sky speaks of sordid gain to us. They fought for our country, not to plunge future generations into the world's wars everywhere. We did it in self-defense. I am not willing to go any further than that now. If again the same conditions arise threatening our peace and safety, I am willing to vote to declare war, to levy armies, to raise navies necessary to defend ourselves; but we can not and ought not go beyond the law of self-defense. It is the law of human selfishness, but we have not reached that idealistic age yet where we can do more in binding ourselves in international alliances than to make that the basis of our Union.

The reasons assigned for exploiting China and Shantung are far from convincing. It is urged that China, with 2,000,000 square miles of territory, not including Thibet and Mongolia, has 90 per cent illiterate of over 300,000,000 inhabitants. If all who are illiterate shall be reduced to servitude, it will be somewhat uncomfortable for some Americans. A great many Central Americans and much of South America will be in sore distress.

Japan is paralleled with this great people, with only 169,381 square miles of territory and 55,000,000 population, only 10 per cent of which are illiterate. It is said there are many obstacles to stable government in China. Different provinces widely separated, little railway communication, and poor highways or none, it is charged the Chinese lack public spirit; that the different communities build up trade barriers against each other, promoting racial conflict among the Chinese themselves. This in turn, it is alleged, leads to international embarrassments and makes it impossible to maintain trade relations. China is called a vast political desert. The oases are the foreign concessions or spheres of influence of Great Britain, France, and Japan. Without such spheres, it is alleged, no communication could be had with the Chinese. I read the philanthropic assertion that "Japan's stern and positive policy toward China has for its aims the protection of Japanese lives and property and the safeguarding of Japan interests."

Japan is obliged, it is urged, to pursue that course to prevent being crowded off the Asiatic mainland. Her absorption of Korea, her occupation of Manchuria, is indispensable to the growth of Japan. It is argued that if a strong nation like Japan or Great Britain does not observe with a vigilant eye Chinese affairs, powers hostile to these Governments will obtain a foothold in China. They therefore combine police and commercial rights, which with Japan ripen into sovereignty. It is said China is too indifferent or pacifistic to exclude such hostile powers as Germany or is unable in war to drive them from her borders. This, therefore, it is presumed, justifies Japan and other nations of similar conscience which are found members of the league of nations to supervise Chinese affairs. It is evident self-interest is the basis of such conduct.

I read the complacent assurance that Japan has a strong central government; that 16 cabinet changes have occurred in 30 years showing that frequent rotation in office guarantees popular rights. If that is a qualification, in 30 years we have had 80 changes in Cabinet officers. So we still have the best of them in that showing.

It is admitted the military power at times act independently of civil government. It might further be admitted that certain extracts from the constitution of Japan do not smack of the self-determination of free people. Article I declares "The Empire of Japan shall be reigned over and governed by a line of emperors unbroken for ages eternal." There is no third term about that. It lasts forever, providing the government lasts that long.

Again quoting from the constitution:

The Emperor is sacred and inviolable. He is the head of the Empire combining in himself the rights of sovereignty.

He is so like Woodrow Wilson. Small wonder there was a community of interests when he met at Paris the representatives of the Japanese Emperor. They were two of a kind.

A fellow feeling makes one wondrous kind.

It is material to notice under the Japanese Constitution the Emperor has the supreme command of the army and navy, declares war, makes peace, and concludes treaties. The Kaiser could do no more in the days he menaced Europe and the world. It is uncomfortably so a similar power. The legislative branch of the Japanese Government is a house of peers and of representatives. The peers are composed of the members of the imperial family, of the orders of nobility, and of those persons who have been nominated thereto by the Emperor, whose reign of himself and his descendants is eternal. That is a good, sound temporal power. That government possesses all the autocracy, the absolutism, and the concentration of the powers of peace and war in a single head that characterized Prussia from the days of Frederick the Great. What such a system developed in Europe among Caucasians it will develop in Asia among Orientals. It is as plain as the noonday sun that the government is autocratic, and that it will add Chinese province upon province, concession upon concession, until an Asiatic Kaiser, armed with all the modern implements of scientific destructive war, will dominate the affairs of Asia and the Pacific Ocean.

There is in the making another Atilla to come from the confines of Asia again to menace all the civilized world, as in the days of Rome, and all western Europe when destruction was threatened at the hands of that ancient barbarian. Such a concentrated power is never at rest. In time it is as certain to raise up a potential world conqueror as that Macedonia produced Alexander or the French Revolution Napoleon or that the Prussian system produced the Kaiser.

China must either develop military strength or yield her sovereignty in the struggle. There is a community of interests, a fraternal bond, between the Chinese and the United States in this fight. The United States has either been overreached by more capable diplomats or the indifference of those recreant to their duty. China was the first to respond from the neutral nations to the call of our President against Germany. She trusted our professions, our ideals of free government, our opposition to wars for territorial conquest, and to the new freedom promulgated by the author on the part of our country of this treaty. The old maxim that those who trust most suffer most is illustrated once more. China, trusting the United States, the Allies, and associated nations at the peace table, finds herself facing another step in the dismemberment of her country. She finds, too, that the United States joins with those who plunder her territory and rob her of her people. This is done when we are preaching to the world confidence in each other and universal peace based upon justice to all, the strong and the weak alike. If this does not rouse China and develop a military spirit, she is doomed unless the United States comes to the rescue. The open door of John Hay, the friendly relations subsisting for many years, the development of China's resources, through the extension of American credits, are all at an end. There is no open door in Shantung. There will be no extension of credit there save as it profits Japan. The excuses made by Japan and her apology aggravate the original injury. They are the reasons that in every age arbitrary power has advanced to despoil and oppress its helpless victims. Like every outrage, the more it is attempted to be justified the more flagrant and inexcusable the aggression becomes.

The mere fact that Japan claims she is the only power sufficiently near to defend China from the covetous hands of other nations lends special significance to this treaty. Under the plea of protection to China she is riveting Japanese control upon that country in perpetuity. The very argument of necessity is Germany's argument in Belgium and France. Her excuse that there is no other direction in which she can expand makes it impossible to believe Japan ever intends to abandon Shantung or release the seizure of the interests enumerated. The more Japan necessities are exhibited the more evident it becomes that those necessities are the supreme law to Japan and not the justice published in the league of nations.

I commend this underlying principle of action in Japan to all those, not only the Senators to-day but those hereafter, who shall so sturdily advance the triumph of justice over the rule of force.

If Japan's great commercial interests are urged, it but strengthens the presumption that Japan will remain where she may have the advantage as against other nations. If it be insisted that Japan is the only independent powerful Government within several thousand miles of Peking, it must be remembered that mere proximity is not now measured by miles, but by swift steamships and wire and wireless communications. Civilization, trade, and friendly relations no longer depend upon mere contiguity. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that Japan is preparing to seize Shantung for permanent occupation. Her history in past affairs justifies this belief. Her practices in relation to other treaties convince the observant that it will be repeated here.

In 1897 Germany, professing to be exasperated by the murder of two exiled German missionaries by ignorant fanatics in Shantung, sent German warships to the bay, bombarded the ports, landed troops, and occupied the territory. In settlement she compelled the Chinese Government to sign a 99-year lease, with concessions for railway building and mining. A mere lease of property by one government to another does not divest the lessor government of sovereignty over the territory so leased. Japan entered the war for the express purpose of driving the Germans out of the leased territory. The expulsion of Germany gave Japan no sovereign rights there which she has since assumed. She not only advanced her army over the leased territory but over neutral Chinese territory as well. Of course, it was necessary; it was another military necessity. We heard much of that in Belgium. It was an outrage unspeakable, and followed by equally unspeakable cruelty in Belgium. It was an outrage in Shantung outside of the leased territory. The harshness of Japanese occupation, the cruelties inflicted on the helpless inhabitants, the seizure of property, and the resulting looting irresistibly turn one's thoughts to the German conduct in Belgium. We denounce one in unmeasured terms. We are asked to approve the other and declare it justified in a holy cause. In order further to sanctify this benevolent absorption Japan took the precaution to obtain a secret covenant with Great Britain and France in February, 1917, that they would support Japan's claims at the peace conference. Great Britain and France knew this clandestine arrangement when China declared war against Germany and joined her forces with the Allies. China was in blissful ignorance of this secret compact. The partition of Poland had something to recommend it. It was done openly and defended by the hardy freebooters, who divided the spoils. The perfidy of China's betrayal needs no comment. It so taints and poisons the altruism with which the league of nations was heralded to the world as to stamp it as the superlative treachery in the history of the world.

Japan intends, we are told, in a limited time to withdraw from Shantung and return the country to the Chinese. Japan has planted herself on the continent of Asia in every instance under a promise to occupy for a limited time. In not a single case, whether by treaty, by lease, by promise, or otherwise, has she withdrawn from occupied territory, nor did she intend to when she entered it, nor will she ever do so if left to her own devices. There is no temporary occupation in the character of the improvements made by Japan. From the time that Germany capitulated, November 7, 1914, Japan has had possession over four and a half years. Their building program for factories, business houses, piers, docks, customhouses, naval yards, and all important public property indicates a permanent occupation. Why should military barracks be built, a permanent military hospital constructed, great harbor improvements, and the like be made merely for claim of temporary occupancy? Japan intends to stay where she has placed herself. We are asked to justify those claims. The 21 demands made on China in May, 1915, and acceded to under threat of war from Japan, have never been disavowed. The three sets of notes of 1915 between China and Japan are significant. In substance they give Shantung to Japan. The claims made can not be reconciled with any other intention. Let Japan's declaration, August 24, 1914, through Count Okuma be considered. He said:

> As Premier of Japan I have stated and now again state to the people of America and to the world that Japan has no ulterior motive, no desire to secure more territory, no desire of depriving China or other people of anything which they now possess. My Government and my people have given their word and pledge, which will be as honorably kept as Japan always keeps her promises.

In May, 1915, he said:

> There is not the least obligation on the Imperial Japanese Government's part to return the place [Shantung] to China.

There is an irreconcilable difference between Japan's promise out of possession of Shantung and her performance in possession.

Everywhere in this country the league of nations is referred to as the basis of permanent peace. There is no peace in injustice. Japan will brook no equal rights in China with any other power. Like Germany, her sphere must be universal and exclusive. She will have not only preferential rights outside of Shantung, but exclusive right in this gateway to the Pacific. The United States will find the open door closed in her face. The great strategic and economic advantages will pass to Japan. Not even peace in China will result. Resentment must inevitably be bred against Japan. Civil commotion and revolution will be the natural result. Instead of preventing future wars, this article of the treaty will inevitably involve the world in a future war at no distant time.

If the party now being developed in China shall gain strength, if a militaristic party shall once seize the reins of power over her 300,000,000 of people, the Chinese can fight as well as other Orientals. If once that mighty power be awakened and the drillmaster of the Caucasian penetrates into the interior of China armed with governmental power, there will awake the strength of the sleeping giant, and she will rid herself of Japan, and she may continue her march to the west when once aroused. It is her only salvation, unless the powers of Christendom shall intervene.

The United States exercises sovereignty in the Philippines. Japan's expansion is seaward as well as landward. Her ambition covers the Pacific Ocean as well as the Asiatic mainland. With Germany in perpetual intrigue, it is no far inference that a practical partition resulting from a union of those two powers in Europe and Asia is no impossible event. So such a coalition is the standing menace of the world's peace. The future of Russia in such a coalition is conjectural. The joinder of Germany and Japan is extremely probable, because it follows the lines of self-interest. World league or no world league, nations will cleave to each other following the law of self-interest. The union of Germany, with her military knowledge, with her scientific power to utilize the forces of nature, with the Prussian of the Orient, will sweep away the cobwebs of a mere documentary league as if it had not been.

The United States asks nothing and expected nothing from this war. She is the only one of the principal nations outside of Belgium that has not asked and some have received the spoils of victory. The Allies have met great losses and incurred heavy expenditures. England has received territorial conquest; France has had restored to her Alsace-Lorraine; Japan succeeds to the rights of Germany in Shantung. Some of these three great powers will divide a large indemnity from defeated Germany. The United States takes nothing save the consciousness of a just cause and the vindication of our country's right. I am not in sympathy with the lofty pretensions that we entered the war to defend the rights of free peoples throughout the world. Neither do I believe our controlling purpose was to defend the weaker nation. The propelling motive was to defend ourselves. Whatever may be said the President himself prior to our entry into the war made it plain enough. In his message of April 2, 1917, he said:

> We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our rights.

July 14, 1917, he declared:

> It is plain enough how we were forced into the war. The extraordinary insults and aggressions of the Imperial German Government left us no self-respecting choice but to take up arms in defense of our rights as a free people and of our honor as a sovereign government.

In his message of December 4, 1917, after we had been eight months at war, he demanded that the war shall not end with annexation, contribution, nor punitive indemnity. The foregoing does not square with the message of July 10, 1919, in which he declared that—

> We entered the war only as a champion of right, which we were glad to share with free men and lovers of justice everywhere.

Neither does it harmonize with the annexation of Chinese territory ratified by this treaty nor the immense gain accruing to Japan of an economic character.

A vote in this Senate is the only barrier in the way of international injustice. The economic barriers to be built up against us in Asia by the advantage given Japan put a new meaning on the repudiation of the third principle of the 14 points. The mention of these forgotten articles serve little more now than to point the moral and adorn the tale of the utter futility of attempting to forecast the future. We emerge from our great adventure with nothing but the loss of life, a great public debt, and a request from the President to set our seal upon this crowning disgrace for us and humiliation of a friendly nation to strengthen a jealous power that more than once has given evidence of profound dissimulation.

Against such an injustice the league of nations can not prevail to procure lasting peace. The expressions of English papers are unequivocal. The London Observer of July 5, 1919, "demands a peace in which there is some consideration for the better natures of all the people, in which there is hope for world democracy, and in which there is less hatred, less provision for war, less cause for war." It quotes with approval a statement that:

So in article after article they have bequeathed to the world not an unprecedented increase in the common stock of good will but new legacies of division, ascendancies, subjections, dismemberment, new motives for hatred and revenge.

Never were such imaginable quantity of words employed with a view to signing, sealing, and delivering engagements which sooner or later will prove utterly untenable in their substance.

I again recur to the 4th day of July—a memorable day in our own country and memorable elsewhere.

July 4, 1919, Lloyd-George addressed the Commons. His preliminary statements of the league of nations were received with loud laughter. It drew from him this paragraph:

I beg no one in Great Britain to sneer at the league of nations. I look on it as a great and hopeful experiment. I beg that this country may give it a fair and honest trial. Let us try. It will not stop all troubles. It may stop some.

That is just about all that Lloyd-George, on his conscience, could say. The news dispatches and the cablegrams in which this was wired over said that the members sat about on the benches with skeptical looks upon their faces; that their visages expressed great humor at the idea of the league of nations accomplishing anything in the settlement of European troubles. The very look on their faces carried with it their skepticism, and aroused even that supposedly nonexistent quality of humor in the English nation. It even made visible that, and it is supposed that it takes a cold chisel to get it through some of the time. I must confess that if that is the best Lloyd-George can do at the end of the war before the British House of Commons, there is no great abiding faith in his heart in the value of this document. If this is all that can be said for it, what can be thought of its use against such an injustice as the Shantung article to this treaty? Does it not require an optimist exceeding the bounds of human probability to predict peace on such a basis?

Japan assumes sovereign rights over Chinese territory. Mere refinement of language or specious interpretation will not remove this impending truth. Japan will not surrender the advantage so gained unless she denies all of her history and practices since she has been known or her affairs opened up to Caucasian governments. Every step taken from her entry on continental Asia years ago to the present points unerringly to her permanent occupation of Shantung. Secret treaties may be disregarded in the league of nations, but they will never be released or forgotten in oriental diplomacy. Alleged rights under them will be urged again in spite of the league of nations. Japan will become the saber rattler of the world. How much terror she will inspire depends upon the self-possession and degree of military and naval preparation of those whom she wishes to affect.

Whether Shantung becomes under article 10 a part of the territorial boundaries of Japan depends on the interpretation of the council of the league. The community of interests in preserving the existing status in Asia will tend to lead Great Britain and Japan to interpret this article alike. If China should appeal to arms to restore her lost Province, we likely will find ourselves in the disagreeable rôle of making war with Japan to vindicate her right to keep it. Our undertaking to preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity of Japan will have an unpleasant ending. Article 10 and the portion of the treaty relating to Shantung are twin brothers of a common iniquity. They speak the language of a joint outrage and bear all the evidence of deliberate prearranged conspiracy.

Great Britain bore a large part in the war. She is a diplomatist who has ever cared for her own imperial interests. Nations, like individuals, are often selfish. We have not forgotten that in 1861 the abolition of slavery appealed to the moral sentiment of civilized mankind. Those who administered the affairs of that Empire forgot the justice of human liberty in the covetous desire to see a commercial rival rent in twain. Before Gladstone died he acknowledged that one of the great mistakes he made was in the sympathy he extended to the Confederate States of America while he administered power for his Empire. The lifeblood of Great Britain is her foreign trade. She is a seafaring nation. Her merchant shipping enters the ports of the globe. She has ever been farsighted, unsentimental, and sometimes practically cruel in promoting her commerce against all competitors. It must be remembered ever that we are now her competitor with the conclusion of peace. The usual motives that have prompted Great Britain in former years will resume their sway. We have grown to very great financial strength. We are without adequate experience in foreign trade. We are upon the threshold of that experiment. Great Britain is keenly observant of our course. She has been void of sentiment and sometimes of humanity in breaking down and destroying her rivals in different parts of the world. She is amply able to take care of herself in every great competitive struggle. While a common language and kindred blood go far to promote friendship, they will not remove Great Britain's disposition to take care of herself.

The United States Government must look well to its own defense and preservation. I regret not to be able to accept the splendid dreams generated by the league of nations. I believe our safety is not mere sentiment; it will rest in the strong arm and disciplined military forces of our people. We have denied Japan the right of immigration for her subjects. It has been repeatedly alluded to during the peace conference of Paris by representatives of that nation. The equality constantly proclaimed in the league logically directs Japan's thoughts to that denial. Its refusal has sunk deep into their sensibilities. It is a wound to their pride. We are vulnerable in the Philippines. Our great friend lies beyond in the people of the Chinese Republic. In our day of peril it must be remembered that the interests of Great Britain and Japan in the Orient are identical. Our strength can be divided and our weakness promoted in the time of extremity to let us wage our war with Japan alone. That will be Great Britain's opportunity to regain the commercial and financial supremacy from us. We can defend ourselves. It will be a heavy price to pay, but it will be paid. We may lose the Philippines. We can afford to do so, but I repeat it is questionable in my mind in that hour of trial if the league of nations or Great Britain will be of material assistance. We must defend ourselves. Our trained forces on land and sea must defend our shores and our territory from invasion. Our greatest friend may then be the Chinese people, whom to-day we are asked to humiliate and dismember. Let us remember, not in selfish purpose but upon the immutable principle of justice to a great people, that we ought to defeat these articles 156, 157, and 158 in this treaty, and send forth at the threshold of this period of alleged universal peace our moral condemnation of the territorial theft committed on a friendly power.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there has been much discussion of late with reference to where public sentiment lies concerning the league of nations. Great effort has been put forth by the advocates of the league to satisfy the Senate that the sentiment in favor of the league is overwhelming. I assume, by reason of the effort that has been made to satisfy those who must vote upon this matter, that public sentiment is behind them, that they are interested in knowing precisely what the public sentiment is, and where the majority of the American people actually stand with reference to this important question.

There can be no reason for this continued and persistent effort upon the part of the advocates of the league to demonstrate that the overwhelming public sentiment is in favor of it other than that of procuring votes in the Senate. I think it is a legitimate enterprise in which they are engaged if properly conducted. Speaker Reed once said, "No man rises above his environment"; and I presume most Senators want to keep fairly in touch with their constituency. I want to suggest to-day, in the beginning of what seems a new crisis, in view of the White House conferences, that there is only one way by which to test accurately the public opinion of this country. I invite those who contend that the public opinion of the country is in favor of the league, and who believe that the people of this country want the league, to consider the proposition which I am going to submit. If they believe what they say, they will accept the proposition.

This is not an ordinary treaty. If it were, the argument might be very well made that, the treaty-making power being lodged entirely with the President and the Senate, it is their duty to discharge the obligation which rests upon them, and that the public sentiment of the country would not be instructive and, of course, would not be binding. But this is something more than a treaty. While it passes in popular parlance by the name of a treaty, it really incorporates a scheme which, either directly or indirectly, greatly modifies our governmental action with reference to foreign affairs and our governmental powers. In other words, it is dealing with a matter which must always be of prime concern to the people, and that is the modification, either directly or indirectly, of the form and functions of their Government. It is not in any sense an ordinary treaty. It is a matter of great concern to every citizen of the country. Everyone who is interested in his Government, in preserving it as it exists, and who is anxious to guard against any unwise modification, would be deeply interested and would be entitled to be consulted with reference to any program which would have a tendency, either through actual contractual obligation or in practice, to change or modify his Government.

A popular vote can be had upon this question if those who are in favor of the league will cooperate with those who are opposed to it. I am perfectly aware that the Congress could not provide for a vote which would be legally binding; but if the advocates wish to know accurately public opinion and then wish to call upon their Senators to conform to that public opinion, if they wish to know the judgment of the country in order that Senators may respond to that judgment, there is only one way to do it, and that is to give the people of the country an opportunity to cast a ballot upon this matter. That vote could be taken either upon the treaty as a whole, including the league, or it could be taken upon the two propositions separately.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Will the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Constitution, of course, provides for the election of Senators and Representatives and for the election or appointment of presidential electors. Will the Senator kindly point out under what section of the Constitution the Congress of the United States could provide for such a vote as he has indicated?

Mr. BORAH. I do not contend, as I said a moment ago, that a vote could be taken which would be covered by the Constitution so as to make it legally binding. I do contend, however, that in this effort to test public opinion which is being made a process and program may be devised by which a really accurate expression of public opinion may be had. As a moral guide it could be secured and I claim nothing more. It will not be legally binding upon the Senate any more than the petitions which are coming in are legally binding. They are sent for their moral effect as a moral guide in the performance of our duty here, or else hundreds of thousands of dollars would not be spent by Wall Street and big business, as the league pamphlet informs us, to get them.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am interested in the legal question now. It will require the expenditure of certain money and the provision of certain machinery in order to conduct such an election as the Senator has in mind. Does the Senator think that the Congress of the United States could provide for an appropriation which would stand the test of the courts that might be necessary for the holding of such an election?

Mr. BORAH. As compared with many appropriations which we have made during the last three years in countless instances, some of which have been sustained, I would have no hesitancy whatever in doing it. I have no doubt whatever that we could make the appropriation. We could avail ourselves of the election machinery of the States through a joint resolution or an act of Congress and take that which would not be legally binding upon us, but that which could for all practical purposes be regarded as a judgment of the people upon this matter. If you want public opinion and propose to call upon Senators to obey public opinion, then let us have as accurate and fair an expression as possible.

I am led to urge this by reason of the fact that every possible method is being adopted and devised for the purpose of throwing into Congress what they claim is the public opinion of the country. My scheme and my process may not be absolutely accurate and possibly could not be measured by legal measurements so that it would in any sense be binding upon anybody; but there could be no possible doubt that it would be infinitely more accurate, and, in fact, so far as moral effect, it would be entirely accurate as to the public sentiment of the country. That, Mr. President, is the program which I have no doubt Congress could provide for and could make the appropriation to pay the expenses of.

If those who are interested in organizing the public opinion of the country are not willing to do that, shall we be asked to accept as any expression of public opinion at all resolutions which are adopted by organizations or conferences or assemblies and sent here? There must be something which is desired to be accomplished by pursuing this method, and if you do desire to achieve as best you may an accurate survey of public opinion then let us go about it in the very best possible way we can under the Constitution.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator has very strong convictions upon the subject of the league of nations as he has upon everything else. I venture to ask him if the expression of public sentiment should be obtained along the line that he suggests or any other and the expression should be for the league instead of against it, would it influence the Senator's vote upon the treaty?

Mr. BORAH. If I should stay in the Senate under such circumstances, it would not influence my vote. I can conceive a situation arising where a Senator from a State would be under obligation to retire.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that answers the question.

Mr. BORAH. But if I should remain here it would not affect my vote. Neither will these petitions and telegrams and letters, manufactured and otherwise, which are sent in here have the slightest effect upon anything that I shall do.

But, Mr. President, I was going to say that there must be a desire on the part of the advocates of the league, assuming that they are acting honestly and in sincerity, to have a survey of public opinion upon this matter. That being true, I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to join with them in securing the very best test of it that we can possibly get under the peculiar circumstances.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me to so say, I differ with him very radically as to the authority which Congress might have to provide for an election of the character indicated. I have no fear as to the result of that election. The only regret I would have in the event that we have it would be that I would be afraid, in view of what the Senator has said, that he would retire from the Senate; and that we would all regret.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator need not feel uneasy. The Senator from Idaho represents a very intelligent and patriotic constituency.

Mr. POMERENE. I was aware of that fact, and it was because of my information on that subject that I ventured the opinion I did.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the President of the United States has been sending for Senators and will continue to send, I understand, until the quota is completed.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment I will yield. That is a program with which I find no fault. I might express regret that it has not more often been adopted. I think possibly good might often be obtained by the program which now has been adopted. I do not criticize it at all. But, Mr. President, I submit it is not in accordance with the best tenets of republican institutions and of democracy to settle the question whether certain sovereign powers of the Republic shall be transferred to a foreign council dominated by foreign powers behind the doors either of the White House or anywhere else other than as nearly as possible we can get to the public mind of the country. In my opinion the proper thing to do would be to "send for the people," and you can do that by passing a law providing for a plebiscite. Let those who will have to bear the burden, pay the taxes, and fight the battles of the future pass upon this question, which involves not merely the making of a treaty but involves in it the reorganization of some of the most important powers of the Government.

I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, holding the views the Senator holds, and with which I think I am in thorough accord as to the power of this body to ratify such a treaty as has been proposed or to assist in the creation of a government ultra constitutional, is it not the opinion of the Senator, as it is mine, that under the tenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States the method proposed by the Senator now is the only method by which the Congress of the United States can ascertain what the people propose to do with the power which is left with them? The tenth amendment reads:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The proposition of the Senator, I understand, is to ascertain from the people themselves whether they desire us to go beyond what we conceive to be our constitutional duty or to violate what we conceive to be our constitutional oath. It strikes me that the only method by which we can ascertain from the people themselves, who have this power, what they desire to be done is by a submission of the question under Article X.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator for calling attention to that particular section of the Constitution.

Mr. President, in undertaking to measure public sentiment and to find out how the people feel about this question, we are constantly meeting with cross currents of public sentiment, and the situation is such at the present time that if one really desires to know how the people feel in regard to the matter there would be no possible way of ascertaining it. We get resolutions, and then we get letters from people who were present declaring the resolutions did not represent the views of the majority of those present.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I was simply going to call the Senator's attention to another section of the Constitution, which seemed to have been overlooked by my distinguished friend, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], with reference to treaties. Section 10 of Article I provides that—

No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation.

I realize, of course, that does not go directly to the question of a vote, but the treaty-making power is vested in the President and the Senate. So without some special legislation by the States I do not understand how we would have any right to provide for a vote upon this subject.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to restate my position, and then I should like to be permitted to make my statement, and at the close of my statement I should be very glad to yield to any interrogatory anyone may desire to submit.

I state again that I am not assuming to present a constitutional basis for a vote in the sense that it would be in any way legally binding upon the Senate. I do say, however, that Congress could pass, either by joint resolution or by a law, some measure providing for a method by which a vote could actually be taken, and so far as a test of public opinion is concerned it could be taken in such way as to make it entirely accurate. I have no doubt about that at all, and I am simply presenting it from the standpoint of being a much better method, a more accurate method, and a more reliable method than the method that has already been adopted and which is being pursued throughout the country to survey public opinion.

Mr. President, we are told day by day that the Europeans are anxiously awaiting our action upon this treaty; that public sentiment throughout Europe is in favor of this treaty and the league of nations. The news is brought to us in one way or another that the great masses of the people throughout war-ridden Europe are anxiously awaiting the action of the Senate. On the other hand, the same processes of news gathering and news purveying carries to the Europeans the fact that the great masses of the American people are in favor of the league of nations and of the treaty. If anyone is interested to investigate just how this news is gathered and how it is purveyed back and forth, he will find that it is a part of the propaganda which is going on, if I may use the term, to mislead the masses of Europe as to the views of the people of America and to mislead the people of America as to the view of the masses of Europe. The censorship is just as active and just as effective and doing business at the old stand in the old way just as much to-day as it was during the war. By a little different process, by a widely organized and highly financed plan, all news which favors the treaty and league is brought across the ocean, amplified, accentuated, and thoroughly distributed, while the news against the treaty and the league is either discouraged or minimized. There has never been in the history of civilized society so thoroughly organized and so thoroughly successful a plan to stress one side and to conceal the facts on the other side. You can not get the real views from the people of France in this country at all. France has a censorship as drastic and as efficacious and as persistent to control news that France does not want to go out as it had during the war. Great Britain is no better, and the United States is worse than either. There is only one kind of news that is permitted to have full report concerning the league of nations from those countries, and that is the manufactured, the propagandized news, to reach a certain purpose and accomplish a certain end. I am speaking now of the news from Europe to America and from America to Europe.

That is not all, Mr. President. We have an organization in this country called the League to Enforce Peace. That organization is industriously organizing the public opinion in this country for the purpose of effecting a ratification of the treaty, and a very large portion of the material which it sends to the Senate is unreliable. It is a misrepresentation of the facts, and the men who send it here are in a position to know that it is a misrepresentation of the facts.

I have in my possession the evidence of three different instances where resolutions were put through under the management or inspiration of this organization which upon their face seem to be an expression of the sentiment of the particular assembly or gathering, when there was not a party connected with putting it through who but must have known that it did not represent the full views of the assembly or gathering. And yet it is all sent here for the purpose of compelling the Senate, under the compulsion of public opinion, to perform an act which is perhaps the most important that it has ever been called upon or ever will be called upon as a Senate to perform.

Let me call attention to one illustration which I am permitted to use. On the 30th day of June the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] read into the RECORD a resolution passed by the Federation of Catholic Alumnæ at St. Louis. It was read here for the purpose of satisfying the Senate that this great Catholic organization was in favor of this league of nations. I will read one single paragraph from it:

Resolved, That this International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ, in convention in St. Louis, Mo., representing educational institutions of more than 40 States and in the Dominion of Canada, indorses a league of nations that will give freedom and justice to all—

And so forth.

I called attention at the time to the fact that while I did not know anything about it, in all probability that was not an indorsement of this league of nations at all. I hasten to say that undoubtedly the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who presented it to the Senator from Nebraska, were misled into the belief that it was an indorsement of this league of nations. We know that those Senators would not have so claimed unless they had believed it. But it was different with those who had been instrumental in securing it and who had been instrumental in getting it into the hands of the Senators. They must have known that it was not only not an indorsement of this league but that it was intended and stated to be at the time it was passed a condemnation of this league. I read a telegram.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, July 1.

Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH: Statement made Monday—

That is, this statement—in Senate that International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ in convention at St. Louis indorsed present form of league of nations not correct. I am personally responsible for an amendment to resolution sent to us for adoption by League to Enforce Peace. Amendment carried unanimously indorsing a league which would give justice and freedom to all the world and protesting against covenant in present form.

ADA K. GANNON,
Governor of Iowa Alumnæ.

I have the following telegram dated to-day:

International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ at convention in St. Louis did not indorse league of nations. Senator HITCHCOCK mistaken.

MRS. CHAS. A. JACKSON,
Waterbury, Conn., National Trustee.

That is one, Mr. President, which I am permitted at this time to use. There are other instances in which the League to Enforce Peace sent abroad resolutions asking for an indorsement of this league, and they were changed, and a league to accomplish certain things was indorsed and sent out as an indorsement of this league. There are hundreds of thousands, and even millions, of people who believe that a league can be framed which will accomplish justice and which will insure peace, and those same hundreds of thousands of people believe that this league will not do that, and therefore they are opposed to it. Even when they send out resolutions indorsing this league and they are rejected for resolutions which indorse a different league, they are sent here as an expression of public sentiment as to this particular league.

Wherever those people express themselves in any way that they may see fit in favor of their proposition, it is immediately transmitted here under the activity of the League to Enforce Peace as an indorsement of their proposition. I denounce the scheme as a deliberate program to deceive the American people. It is well worthy of the organization, backed as it is by interested financiers of the United States, who for selfish purposes would make this Government underwrite their investments in Europe. The first thing the ex-President of the United States ought to do, if he wishes to preserve an honored name from contempt, is either to put an end to such methods as is now being carried on or withdraw his name from the organization.

Mr. President, let us examine for a moment the public opinion of Europe on this subject as it comes up from the masses of the people of Europe. I hold in my hand a synopsis of expressions from a number of liberal newspapers of Europe. Everyone knows that the liberal people of Europe, the liberal newspapers, have been for a league, and we are told therefore that this vast sentiment of the struggling people of Europe is in favor of this league. What are the facts? The facts are that the liberal organizations, the liberal sentiment, the liberal mind, and the liberal press of Europe are against this league. It is coming in slowly, coming by freight, because, as I say, the news purveyors do not carry this information and the masses of the American people do not get it. But it is coming along as we get their weekly publications, as we get their resolutions, and the expressions of their leaders.

The New Statesman is familiar to all readers of English periodicals, a liberal publication. In a recent issue it says:

In public the proposals of the Allies may find a few defenders; in private they find none.

Another English publication says:

The more closely the treaty of peace and the covenant of the league of nations are examined the more absurd and unworkable do they appear.

The London Nation, one of the ablest of the liberal publications, in a late issue, declares:

Now, we know what is in store for us. There the peace terms are as they were in 1772, 1815, 1866, and 1871. Will no disaster ever teach us? For the covenant of the league might as well try to alter and maintain new courses for the planets as to regulate the passions challenged in the treaty terms, to moderate the greed and resentment generated by such annexations and transferences of peoples. It is all impossible. Though potent of evil beyond any computation, the treaty, before it is signed, is as dead as a tablet of Babylon.

Further along in the same editorial is this paragraph:

For whatsoever a man soweth that shall he reap. There is no escape from that law. Time hunts him down. No covenants in any league can forge a substitute for the consequences of committing evil. Men have their passions, and for a time may be deluded into a wrong use of them by leaders who say one thing, but mean the doing of another. Yet there is a term to it all, for the majority of men are not mean, are not cunning, nurse no cold and evil intent, are not cruel and vindictive. We know they can be just and generous to the point of sacrificing all they have, even their lives, to a right cause. But statesmen who still base their policies on sentiments which their peoples no longer hold, on passions no longer felt, can not pretend that Europe has not during five years afforded them with examples of what happens to those who maintain a folly after its popular sanction has gone.

The compulsion of the treaty terms is based not on their inherent reason and justice but on a blind trust in force; on the ability of arms to compel from others what otherwise they would never grant. The old idea.

In another editorial of the New Statesman, after commenting on the work at Versailles, says:

Yet the delegates in Paris, bound by their own words and by the wretched bargains which they have made with each other, appear determined to press the issue and to force on Europe a peace which no one wants and which can not fail to bring fresh disasters upon the world.

In the New Age, another Liberal paper or periodical, says:

Nobody can tell in what place the inherent rottenness of the edifice will first show itself. By a colossal effort of military, naval, economic, and every other form of support it is just possible, indeed, that for a generation or two the Versailles building will appear to stand upright. But fall it will sooner or later, and on its fall the world will be once more engaged in universal murder and suicide. Public opinion, no less than kings of old, pays dearly for the favorites who slobber upon its neck and play upon its weaknesses.

In a later issue of the London Nation I find another editorial. It is too long to read here, but I quote paragraphs:

What are men and women to do who have any thought for the future, any apprehension for what is latent in the treaty terms, any sorrow and alarm because of the terrible and unmerited sufferings to-day of millions of innocents in Europe? Is not all being done for us, and in a way which fills us with the deepest anxiety? Something very different ought and must be done. All Conservatives, Liberals, and Socialists, who are alike in thinking that civilization, leaderless and blind, is drifting to destruction, accelerated by the old sort of peace, with its usual accessories, inevitable wars of every kind, are looking for a rallying point. Their differences may wait. Their differences are minor. Their differences had to wait in 1914. To-day the time is no less serious and urgent than then; indeed, it is now more serious and urgent. Various religious bodies have protested against the peace; but they are almost helpless, and they know it. The truth is, we are troubled by a sense of an endangered future, and many of us are looking to organized labor to help us—doubtfully, it is true; uncertain of its mind, still more uncertain of the ability and aim of its leadership. But we ask: Where else shall we look?

Yet it must be confessed that the terms of peace have been received by labor also with a feeling of helplessness; and this feeling, in a measure, extends to the organized labor movements in the various allied countries. But it must be said for international labor that its voice is the first to be raised in effective condemnation of the "peace." The French Socialists are united from right to left and are in accord with the French trade-unions in a repudiation of the treaty in spirit and letter. The Italian Socialists are even more strongly opposed, and the British labor party has issued a manifesto in which the injustices and absurdities of the Paris proposals are exposed. Japan has still no organized labor movement that can make its voice heard, while the American labor movement is too divided politically to be articulate on any noneconomic issue. But to the voices of British, French, and Italian labor is added the voice of the labor international, which has promptly repudiated the peace of injustice and violence. Whatever may or may not follow in the way of action, there can be no doubt that labor is everywhere opposed to the old diplomacy of Versailles.

Again writes the editor of the New Age:

It is too late in the day, however, to attempt to enlist on behalf of reaction the terrors once associated with German Prussianism. Germany, it can not be concealed, is, in the common phrase, down and out; and the fresh fears of the English people are no longer of Prussianism abroad, but of Prussianism at home. It is significant that everywhere the complaint of organized labor of every class is directed against "militarism."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator construe that article as a condemnation of the entire treaty rather than any particular portion or section of it?

Mr. BORAH. It is a condemnation of the entire treaty, including the league of nations.

Mr. THOMAS. Including the league of peace?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is correct.

I read a paragraph from an editorial in Reconstruction, under date of August, 1919. This is a liberal publication, published in this country. While it is comparatively new, it voices the views of a very large constituency:

We should all like a league of free nations, meaning, thereby, a league dominated and controlled not by Old World diplomatists and politicians but dominated and controlled every inch of the way by the peoples of the world.

Is the league advocated by Mr. Wilson such a league? He knows it is not. Everybody knows it is not. This league, if formed, will be controlled by the same constituent elements that have heretofore controlled world politics. The people will have nothing to say as to who shall be their national representatives in the league, not even the people of the United States. Nor in any nation will the people have an opportunity by direct ballot to halt any league move that they believe is drawing them into war.

* * * * * * *

What in the last analysis does the league policy mean but force? It is true that it provides for a certain amount of talk before force is used, but has there not always been enough talk before war was declared? What are the English workingmen afraid of now in their own country? They are afraid of militarism. They take it for granted that the league of nations will come into being; but they have no confidence in it, and they are afraid of militarism. The league covenant provides for the use of all the force it can muster against those who do not bow to its decisions. The President speaks as if the league covenant provides for disarmament. If it did, the league would have stronger claims to public confidence.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator from what paper he was reading?

Mr. BORAH. The last statement?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The issue of Reconstruction of August, 1919.

The New Republic, published in this country, was one of the first advocates of a league—a faithful supporter of this administration and able advocate of the 14 points—but it rejects the present treaty with the league incorporated in decisive and in what might be called, if it were not so well justified, bitter language. It says:

It [the treaty] weaves international animosities and the class conflict into the very fabric of the proposed new system of public law. The European politicians who with American complicity have hatched this inhuman monster have acted either cynically, hypocritically, or vindictively, and their handiwork will breed cynicism, hypocrisy, or vindictiveness in the minds of future generations. The moral source of the political life of modern nations remains polluted. * * * In our opinion the treaty of Versailles subjects all liberalism, and particularly that kind of liberalism which breathes the Christian spirit, to a decisive test. * * * Liberalism lost the peace. That is triumphantly proclaimed by the reactionaries. There are no fantastic ideals, they point out, in the peace of Paris. It is the same kind of peace as the peace concluded after any war of older time—a peace of spoils to the victor, woe to the vanquished, and all the spoils and woe that the traffic could bear or more. Nor do the liberals read any other meaning in the peace.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. KING. I do not quite assent to the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado, if I understood his suggestion, and the reply of the Senator from Idaho. I have read a number of those articles to which the Senator refers, as well as some of the so-called liberal publications of Europe and some of the so-called liberal publications of the United States. As I read those publications, the condemnation is not of a league—that is, an organization seeking the cooperation of the nations for the purpose of ameliorating the conditions of war—but the liberal papers of Europe, particularly those of England, denounce the treaty because of its supposed harshness to Germany; and the Senator will recall that recently a Socialist convention was held in Italy and another convention was held which Miss Jane Addams attended, and there was at each of those conventions a severe arraignment of the treaty because it was alleged that it bore too heavily upon the German people. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think he can deduce from those publications a condemnation of the principle of a league for the purpose of securing peace and enforcing peace.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken to a certain extent, and to a certain extent he is correct. There is no doubt that the liberal press of France and all of Europe is generally opposed to the treaty, and has condemned it. It is equally true, however, that the same liberal press has condemned, in connection with the treaty, the league as it is now incorporated in the treaty and as it is now framed. The Senator will find over and over again it is condemned because it does not inhibit conscription, because it fails to incorporate the principle of self-determination and those principles which were indorsed by the liberal press of Europe in the inception as the basis of the league. The contention is now made by the liberal press of Europe that this league does not conform to the league which they had indorsed or, indeed, to the league which the President had indorsed before he went to Europe.

The fact is that during the war certain propositions were announced as being essential to a successful league of nations. One of those principles was that of self-determination. Another principle, as announced from Europe, at least, was that there should be a provision for disarmament which should be effective and a provision against conscription. The liberal press of Europe are in condemnation of this league because it fails to comply with those propositions and many others. Now, mind you, what I am trying to present is the fact that when it is stated to the American people that the masses of the people of Europe are in favor of this league it is a misconstruction of the public sentiment of that country.

The fact is, Mr. President, that Mr. Wilson went to Europe with one league. He came back with an entirely different league. He went to Europe with a league based upon the principle of democracy, a league of people based upon the principle of self-determination, of absolute disarmament, of the freedom of the seas, and he returned with a different league. He went to Europe with an American league based upon the principles of the American Government, of representation, of democracy, and of free institutions. He came home with a European league based upon the principle of imperialism, of force; and it is condemned by the liberal people of Europe for that reason.

Mr. Wilson may not be willing to admit that he went with an American league and came back with a European league, but the people of Europe know that he did. I challenge any man to find in this league a single principle which was announced as the basis of a league before the meeting of the peace conference. It is the old European system of imperialistic power, with force—force to the limit—that is incorporated in this league. The people of Europe have discovered that fact, and while they condemn the treaty they also condemn the league; and they especially condemn the league in view of the fact that the league is organized for the purpose of enforcing the terms of the treaty, which, as this article which I have read says, will necessarily mean war, interminable war, for Europe.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The last statement of the Senator is somewhat surprising to me. One of the mental criticisms I have made of the framework of the league is the absence of that degree of force which seemed to me to be necessary to make its decrees effective. We all know that in the last analysis the element which governs society and makes its decrees effective is force. Now, if I comprehend the framework of this league, its provisions only reach the limit of force after other efforts at correction and discipline have been attempted and exhausted, and not then until the nations themselves shall be heard from.

It has seemed to me, for example, that there was no force provided for in the provisions of the league that could effectively prevent the rebellion—if I may use that term—of a great power like England or the United States. For instance, if Great Britain should refuse to conform to the provisions of the league and an economic boycott was declared against her, my opinion is that it would prove ineffective, if not ridiculous; for to attempt to boycott by economic discrimination an empire covering two-thirds of the surface of the globe—not occupying all that territory, of course—is an impossibility. It seemed to me, therefore, that one weakness of the league lay in the fact that apparently no effective provision is contained in it which the league could primarily enforce if the member to be discriminated was one of the great powers.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is correct, as usual. The league is an absurdity wherein it provides for economic pressure, so far as the five great powers are concerned. Of course, it would be absurd to talk about enforcing an economic boycott against England, and nobody contemplates that the league ever intends to do it.

Mr. THOMAS. Or the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Or the United States or Japan or France; but what about the countless millions who are held in subjection by those powers? What about small nations or subject peoples? They will be crushed into subjection. In this case, as in all other leagues, the nations against which decrees run will be small nations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as to them, the league does not provide for the exercise of force, if I have read it correctly, except as a last resort.

Mr. BORAH. Well, there is always a certain amount of talking before war.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; and there is a good deal of talking after war.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but, Mr. President, as the President said in his address at Boston, lying back of all this is the organized or major force of the world. If you take military power out of this league, it crumbles; but I ask the Senator from Colorado to say where in this league any subject nationality can ever secure its independence or its freedom or its liberty by any orderly fashion or in any orderly way pointed out by the league itself? If the Egyptians want freedom, how can they get it? If India wants freedom, how can she get it? If Korea wants freedom, how can she get it? Where is the democracy or the self-determination which permits the subject nationalities to enjoy that which they were promised? Where is the principle of self-determination or the rights of small nations except as the five great nations see fit to grant it as a benevolent despot?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think that raises an entirely different question.

Mr. BORAH. That is the question I was thinking of.

Mr. THOMAS. So far as the internal affairs of the various nations as they are now constituted are concerned, the league does not pretend to interfere. The only way in which the nations to which the Senator refers could secure independence would be by a successful revolution, just as America obtained independence by a successful revolution a great many years ago.

Mr. BORAH. But America never could have obtained her independence if there had been a league of nations in existence at that time, because France, instead of assisting America, would have been siding with Great Britain to suppress America.

Mr. THOMAS. That may be true; but in the event of an internal difficulty, an insurrection occurring among any part of the peoples of the great powers without a league, the instances are exceptional where they obtain external aid. It is true that without the league they might obtain it, and with the league they might not and probably could not. But I am unable to reconcile my ideas and understanding of history if a league such as this to enforce peace can be ultimately effective unless force somewhere is placed behind it, and if it is not there, then the league is foredoomed to failure, because it has no sanction behind it which the nations composing it will respect when dissensions arise.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I think if the Senator from Colorado will read the whole of the treaty with Germany, as I take it he has——

Mr. THOMAS. I have read it twice.

Mr. LODGE. Then the Senator must have noticed a number of places—I believe I have counted 77—where the execution is left entirely in the hands of the principal allied and associated powers—that is, the five powers—and he will find, in many of those, provision for force.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true; but that has reference to the enforcement of this treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. THOMAS. My criticisms were based upon the absurd proposition of the possibility of the success of the league of nations without the sanction of force behind it.

Mr. LODGE. There is plenty of force there to carry out this treaty. I am not quarreling with it, but it is there, and it is not left to the league to do.

Mr. THOMAS. My criticism is not confined to the treaty itself, but is designed to call attention to the operation in futuro upon the nations which may require discipline under this league. If there is no force for that purpose, of course there can be no discipline.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the vice of the argument of those who are supporting the league, as it seems to me, arises out of the fact that whenever they reach a point where they think it will be effective, and might be injurious to the United States, for instance, they say that we can refuse to act. Now, of course the right of revolution, or the right of withdrawal by force, can never be prevented by a mere legal or written instrument. That will always exist; but under article 10 and article 11, assuming that we are going to live up to the league, assuming that we are going to abide by the terms of the contract, then the combined military force of the five great powers is there, subject to the direction and action of the council at Geneva. Now, it is perfectly true that the United States might say: "I will disobey. I will refuse to act on the advice of the council." The minute it does, your league goes down like a house of cards; I agree to that; but I am arguing this league proposition upon the theory that if the United States enters into a contract, it will abide by the terms of that contract as the contract is construed by those whom the United States has agreed shall construe it.

It is one of the most absurd things to me in all the arguments presented by the advocates of the league that we will agree, for instance, under article 11, that the league shall take cognizance of anything which concerns the peace of the world, and that the council shall advise in regard to what shall be done, and then, if it does not suit us, that we will refuse to follow the advice. We may refuse, but we can not honorably refuse to follow the advice of those whom we have solemnly agreed shall advise. If that is true, then you have the combined military power of Japan, Great Britain, Italy, France, and the United States subject to the direction and control of five men, or nine at most, sitting at Geneva, and you have by every moral law the obligation of the United States to obey the instructions which are sent to her. And, Mr. President, let me go a step further. Let us assume that we could withdraw, that we could refuse to obey. I do not agree that we could honorably do so, but let us assume that we could, and let us take an illustration such as we have in the Senate to-day.

An international situation involving possible war arises. The council at Geneva advises a certain course. That course may consist of our sending, we will say, 100,000 or 250,000 or 300,000 troops to Russia or to Japan or the Balkans. You will say to me: "But the Congress of the United States must act upon it." Very well. The Congress of the United States convenes, and we have the argument which is now being presented to us as Senators who are opposed to this proposition, that "the great nations of the earth have agreed. Shall Congress stand in the way, or refuse, or step out, and break the heart of the world?" The Congress of the United States would be dealt with as it is being dealt with to-day; it would be treated with contempt for assuming to have an opinion of its own and insisting upon its constitutional right against the combined judgment of the great nations of the earth. It might not be, under the Constitution, technically binding upon us, but we would first have the moral obligation, and next we would have the pressure which would be brought to bear from every capital of Europe and perhaps from the great centers of the United States to whip Congress into line, and Congress would become an amanuensis for the five men sitting at Geneva. Especially would that be true if a few billion dollars of securities held by international bankers were in peril.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. As bearing upon our obligation to accept what has been called the advice of the council, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the language used by the President of the United States in his recent address. I will read one rather long sentence, on page 9:

> It was only as the difficult work of arranging an all but universal adjustment of the world's affairs advanced from day to day from one stage of conference to another that it became evident to them that what they were seeking would be little more than something written upon paper, to be interpreted and applied by such methods as the chances of politics might make available—

I invite particular attention to this, now:

> If they did not provide a means of common counsel which all were obliged to accept, a common authority whose decisions would be recognized as decisions which all must respect.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator for calling attention to that. There can be no doubt about our obligation to accept the advice of those whom we have designated to be our advisers. I do not think it is a solid foundation upon which to rest an argument to say that we would not be bound to accept the advice of those whom we had agreed with all other nations should be our advisers.

Mr. President, when our President was before us a few days ago, in his address on the 10th, he said:

> Shall we or any other free people hesitate to accept this great duty? Dare we reject it and break the heart of the world?

That statement, Mr. President, of course, implies—in fact, it unmistakably asserts—that the entire world is anxiously waiting for the acceptance of this league as an assurance of peace and of a return of the tranquillity which it craves.

Let us see. In the first place, I take it, there is no doubt that the rejection of this treaty and this league will not break the heart of China. There are 400,000,000 people—one-third, almost, of the population of the earth. If this treaty and this league are adopted there can be no possible doubt that it will not only be a disappointment to nearly one-third of the population of the earth, but that it will result in creating a feeling of resentment and bitterness of the 400,000,000 people if the treaty and the league are adopted. They will believe, as they now believe, that by reason of the combined power of the five great nations their country has been practically dismembered. It has at least been humiliated, and a vast portion of the people have been transferred to an alien power. They are therefore not only not in favor of the league, but its adoption will result in creating a feeling of bitterness throughout the entire Far East. It will not break the heart of China if it is rejected, but it will indeed break the heart of China if it is adopted.

Will it create a feeling of content and satisfaction with the 140,000,000 people of Central Europe, those who have protested in the most strenuous way and only signed the treaty under perhaps the most remarkable protest that was ever presented by a people—the Germans and their allies?

Will it be satisfactory to the 180,000,000 of Russia? Will it be satisfactory to the countless millions of India? Will it break the heart of those who are excluded from it?

We think in this country that India is satisfied with her situation. The fact is that discontent and unrest and incipient revolution pervade India at this time. Will it be a gratification to India to know that a convention has been made which practically precludes any subject nationality from ever securing its independence except by revolution, and that in case of revolution no great power will be permitted to assist it either directly or indirectly?

Will it be satisfactory to the Egyptians? Egypt is being held in subjection to-day by the actual force of the British arms. Anyone who has read the letters of Mr. Ellis or who has investigated the matter knows that condition in Egypt is that of imminent revolution and the only thing that holds them in subjection is the superior power of the British Empire.

I have a telegram here which reads as follows:

> PARIS, June 30, 1919.
> Mr. BORAH,
> The Senate, Washington:
> In the name of humanity and justice, and in the name of the entire Egyptian people, whom I have the honor to represent, I thank you most sincerely for your kind reference to Egypt. We who have fought side by side with the Allies, who have sacrificed so heavily for what we considered the cause of liberty and justice, have been denied a hearing in the peace conference contrary to the principles for the realization of which America had entered the war. The souls of the Pharaohs have therefore been treated as a salable property and chattels. The Egyptian people rely wholly upon the support of the freedom-loving American people for the realization of the national aspiration of a people who have been condemned unheard to a permanent servitude.
> SAAD ZAJOUL,
> Chairman of the Egyptian Delegation.

I do not think, Mr. President, that a rejection of the treaty and a rejection of the league will break the heart of Egypt. I do not think it will break the heart of Ireland. I do not think it will break the heart of India. I know it will not break the heart of China. It will not break the heart of Korea. I do not think it will break the heart of the liberal people of Europe.

I repeat, the President went to Europe with a league of which all the people were in favor. The people of Egypt, of India, of Ireland, and all the subject nationalities were in favor of the proposition which the President submitted to the world. They went to the peace conference hoping to be heard and to have written into the league a principle which would enable the mass of people to secure their freedom in an orderly and proper way. That was denied them. It has been inhibited from the league, and they are now in a position where there is no avenue of escape from their bondage except that of revolution, with all possible help cut off from the outside.

Mr. President, there are just three classes in Europe who are now in favor of this league as it is written—that is, the governing class, the military class, and the great financiers or international bankers. So far as the masses of the people are concerned, if we can judge accurately from the evidence which is coming in constantly and day by day, however much they were in favor of the original proposition, they are not in favor of the league as it has been submitted.

I do not speak in a spirit of mere criticism. I speak what all men know and what history will record when I say that this league is not the league the world was promised. The league that was promised, and which, doubtless, millions hoped for, was a league based upon the principles of democracy. This league is based upon the principles of imperialism. The one promised spoke of the rights of small nations. This league, in its very inception and by those who framed it, denies a hearing to Egypt, to India, to Ireland, and turns Korea back to the shambles of a rapacious power. The league promised was to declare that no peoples should ever be ruled by a superior power against their consent. This league has placed nearly one-half of the people of the globe under the control of those from whose rule they asked to be relieved or from whose threat of domination they asked to be protected. The league which was promised spoke of peace, but this league has intertwined in its very being, and without which it would never be accepted, a special alliance for war. The league which was promised was a league based upon Americanism and American principles. This league is based upon the European system and faithful in every respect to the system from which it sprang.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, if it is not incompatible with the public interest, whether or not the committee has considered two resolutions heretofore referred to it and dealing with the question of Mexico, the latter one particularly calling for an investigation of conditions in Mexico?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, an inquiry put in that formal and delightful manner, of course, I must answer at once. We have not taken up the Mexican resolutions. As the Senator knows, we have been buried under a treaty of 80,000 words, which we have been trying to read as a preliminary. I shall be very glad to ask the committee to take up these resolutions and dispose of them at the first possible moment.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on next Monday I shall desire to seek recognition to address the Senate on the subject of the league of nations.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that, with the permission of the Senate, on Monday next, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall submit some observations on the league of nations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that, immediately following the routine morning business on Tuesday next, I shall briefly discuss the league of nations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on Wednesday next, after the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate on the league of nations.

Mr. REBER with Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. WOODYARD with Mr. ASHBROOK.

Mr. STINESS with Mr. BRUMBAUGH.

Mr. REBER. I desire to vote "no."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. REBER. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not vote.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to answer "present."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. HAYDEN. No.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman can not vote.

Mr. HAYDEN. But I am entitled to answer "present."

Mr. MCKINIRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request. I desire to answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no authority to grant it.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL moves, as a substitute to the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], to recommit the bill H. R. 4373 to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to forthwith report the same back to the House with the following amendment: On page 43, line 5, strike out the figures "$6,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$8,000,000."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is not debatable. The previous question has been ordered on the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the substitute and on the original motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first put the request of the gentleman from Wyoming that he may address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Was not there a motion made for the previous question the other afternoon which would cut off another amendment?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment and on the motion to recommit by the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming and on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. I would like to ask the Chair if a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is to instruct the committee to report a provision in the bill appropriating $8,000,000 for vocational education instead of appropriating $12,000,000, as the original Buchanan motion provides?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if my motion is adopted it will make $14,000,000 available for this purpose——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry, which I think is entirely proper for the information of the House and not for myself, I know. If the motion made by the gentleman from Wyoming——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. There is no motion of the gentleman from Wyoming before the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House without being interrupted by some gentleman who does not know anything about the proceedings [applause], I was just about to ask the Chair if the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wyoming was adopted then the original Buchanan amendment as substituted would be voted on? Is that correct? It is in the nature of an amendment——

The SPEAKER. It is a substitute.

Mr. GARNER. Well, a substitute. And if the substitute to the original amendment is adopted then the original amendment as substituted must be voted on by the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. GARNER. The parliamentary inquiry is this, Mr. Speaker: If the House adopts the substitute of the gentleman from Wyoming, it will then have to adopt the amendment as substituted, so those voting against the proposition of the gentleman from Wyoming would still have an opportunity to vote if it was substituted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the House that the Chair does not think it is proper procedure for gentlemen, under guise of parliamentary inquiry, to engage in debate. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I think I am entitled to say——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. GARNER (continuing). That I desired to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas demands the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker——

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 202, nays 184, not voting 44, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. FREEMAN with Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi.

Mr. COSTELLO with Mr. WOODS of Virginia.

Mr. STINESS with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington with Mr. SMITH of New York.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas with Mr. RAKER.

Mr. BAER with Mr. GRIFFIN.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana with Mr. DOREMUS.

Mr. GOULD with Mr. FLOOD.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan with Mr. HOLLAND.

Mr. LANGLEY with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia.

Mr. MCFADDEN with Mr. POU.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. REED of West Virginia, is absent from the city. I desire to announce that if he were present he would vote for the passage of this bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. GOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a portion of a letter, and also remarks of my own, on conditions in the Near East.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. On what subject?

Mr. LARSEN. On conditions in the Near East.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COPIES OF THE PEACE TREATY.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up concurrent resolution No. 5, providing for the printing of 50,000 copies of the treaty with Germany, 40,000 of which are to go to the Senate and 10,000 to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of concurrent resolution No. 5. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, that is not a fair divvy between the Senate and the House.

Mr. KIESS. I realize that the proportion is the wrong way, but because of the fact that the Senate has to deal entirely with the peace treaty and that it is not a matter for the House, the committee consented to that division, thinking 10,000 copies would be enough for the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that this is a Senate concurrent resolution, and that it has not yet come over from the Senate. Therefore the gentleman withdraws his request.

NEAR EAST RELIEF.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the bill S. 180 from the Speaker's table and put it on its passage in lieu of bill H. R. 412, which has been reported from the Judiciary Committee and is on the House Calendar, No. 36.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Speaker to lay before the House the bill S. 180, to incorporate Near East Relief.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not feel at liberty to do that under the rule already existing.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, is not the bill S. 180 accompanied by the House bill 412 subject to being called up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can not under the terms of the rule under which the House is operating making the prohibitory enforcement bill in order.

Mr. WALSH. And if the Chair will permit me to state, the rule requires that the Senate bill must come over after the House bill has been reported, which is not the case.

The SPEAKER. It can not come up except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARD. Is it the ruling of the Chair that it can only come up so long as the pending rule prevails?

The SPEAKER. That is all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH] was called out while we were taking the vote on the passage of the sundry civil bill, but is now present. Inasmuch as there is no opposition to the bill, I ask unanimous consent that he may be recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that can not be done by unanimous consent.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6810.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I rise for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLEN. I want to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if he can give us any information when we may possibly arrive at a vote?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CULLEN. The reason I ask is that I am gathering some statistics relating to the loss of revenue in the State of New York, which I would like to have incorporated in the RECORD. I have not received it up to this minute, and the question in my mind is whether I will be able to get those statistics into the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman can get them in now if he asks permission.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, so far as it relates to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose there was an amendment pending to section 2 of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: Page 2, line 18, after the word "conduct," strike out the words "prosecution of."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, if it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEE as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: Strike out lines 17, 18, and 19 on page 2 of the bill. Strike out the comma after the word "offenders" and insert a period.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of offering this amendment is that we may strike from the bill the provision authorizing agents and inspectors of the Internal-Revenue Department to conduct the committing trial of offenders to be bound over to the grand jury before the United States commissioner.

Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that it lowers the dignity of the United States courts to permit any individual to appear and conduct an examination in the absence of the United States attorney or his assistant. Not only does it lower the dignity of the court itself, but it reverts in many instances to injury both to the Government and the defendant, for this reason: An inspector is not acquainted with the rules of law and the rules of evidence, and might introduce before the commissioner evidence illegal in its character, so that without foundation in law men might be bound over to the grand jury where there is no possibility and no probability of an indictment by the grand jury, and the twofold purpose results—one is an innocent man is bound over because some one is not acquainted with the rules of evidence and the provisions of the Criminal Code and conducts the examination in such a manner as to bring out testimony that is not legal.

Upon the other hand, in many instances the examining trial is reduced to writing. The testimony in many of the States of the Union of witnesses taken at the examining trial operates as the appearance under the Constitution that holds that a party must be confronted by witnesses. The Government, in the absence of a trained lawyer or a man experienced in the law and in its procedure, finds itself with testimony taken at an examining trial, where the witness leaves the State and is no longer available, of such a meager character that the Government is deprived of the testimony that would have resulted in the conviction of the defendant.

Mr. Chairman, a prohibition law ought not to be any different from any other law. I am opposed, I will frankly state to the House, to the enactment and continuance of war-time prohibition, as I am opposed to the continuance of all these war-emergency measures that were put upon the people in order that the war might be successfully conducted, and for that period only. So far as my State is concerned, prohibition has been adopted by the constitutional vote of the people of that State. Therefore, it is a moot question there; but I do not desire to vote for a code for the enforcement of the new constitutional provision of the country that is not based on a rule of sane reasoning and procedure. I submit to the House that while it might be done ordinarily, it is a dangerous precedent to turn over the committing examination of a citizen of this country for violation of the Federal law of the land to a man not trained in the law and not holding a license from the constituted authorities of his State.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Texas is aware of the fact that in most of the Federal districts in this country there is a district attorney, with one or two assistant district attorneys, and that they have their offices at the headquarters of the Federal court, which is usually in the largest city in the district. Some of those districts may extend over two or three hundred miles, and it would be physically impossible for the assistant district attorneys or the district attorney to attend these examining trials. What provision would the gentleman make in a case of that kind for some one to represent the Government?

Mr. BEE. Let me ask the gentleman this question: How many United States commissioners have you in the same district where you have one district attorney and several assistant district attorneys?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is a United States commissioner wherever there is a Federal court held.

Mr. BEE. Therefore, if you have a Federal court, where you have the Federal court do you not have an officer detailed?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at all. There is no assistant district attorney detailed for the office where there is a commissioner. The assistant district attorneys remain in the office of the district attorney. The commissioners are scattered about over the State at places where the Federal courts are held twice a year or more frequently, or not so often, as the case may be; but there is no regular assistant district attorney stationed at every place where the court is held.

Mr. BEE. Of course, I do not know the procedure elsewhere, but in my district we have a district attorney and the court is held at four different places. We have a United States assistant district attorney at each one of those places, and wherever there is a commissioner there ought to be some one to represent the peace and dignity of this great Government and not have it turned over to some individual.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is to perfect the paragraph. The so-called substitute is to strike out the paragraph, and the question will therefore first occur on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, this is a strange proposition to present. If the gentleman's motion was carried, he would not accomplish what he seeks at all, because under the general practice these agents would carry on these committing trials just as they are doing everywhere and in every State. I do not believe there is any law anywhere that requires an attorney admitted to practice law to appear before a committing magistrate.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just a moment. The object of this provision which the amendment proposes to strike out is to limit these men by placing them under the control of the district attorneys. That is all. If there should be any that were not carrying on these prosecutions in a proper fashion, the United States attorney could refuse to have them appear before these courts and prosecute.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I did not understand that the gentleman asked me to yield.

Mr. GARD. I was merely suggesting a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that he can not take another gentleman off the floor with a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARD. I have no desire to take the gentleman off the floor.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We had this matter under consideration when the bill was up on Saturday, and my understanding was that this section had been fully considered, and that there was no serious objection to it. Certainly there is no objection to it upon the ground suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE], and in view of the great amount of time that has been taken on this bill and the very liberal discussion allowed, coupled with the further fact that this is not a matter of vital consequence one way or the other, I move that all debate upon the section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. The Chair suggested a while ago that the question for the consideration of the committee was the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. The so-called substitute of the gentleman from Texas is to strike out the section. I am informed—and I am merely stating this for those who may not have heard the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota—that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] and others desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out can not be a substitute, because the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky was to insert certain words. The motion of the gentleman from Texas is to strike out all of the section after the end of line 16. After the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky is acted upon, then the question will recur upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The only Member rising in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas was the chairman of the committee, Mr. VOLSTEAD, who in effect stated that he did not consider the amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. The parliamentary inquiry is this, Mr. Chairman. [Cries of "Vote!"] That is not going to stop me when I want to address the Chair. Is such a motion in order until a Member of this Congress who desires to be heard in opposition to the amendment has been given opportunity to do so?
